Medical breakthrough from Israel

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

YOKNEAM — There was no hiding the expression of pride and satisfaction on the face of the vice-president, marketing, of Given Imaging when he announced that his company's revolutionary video capsule has just been granted U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) approval for clinical trials.

The company will now carry out human clinical trials in New York and London in what has been described as one of the biggest ever medical breakthroughs in diagnostic medicine.

Known as the M2A Swallowable Imaging Capsule, the device contains a miniscule colour video camera, complete with flash and batteries, a transmitter and antenna. All this is contained in a disposable capsule one centimetre in diameter and 2.6 centimetres in length.

The M2A, which is the brain child of Dr. Gavriel Iddan, formerly head of the electro-optical design division of the Israel Rafael Armament Development authority, allows doctors to see images of the length of the human digestive system in incredible detail.

Today the main diagnostic tools are the endoscope and X-rays. Apart from the fact that the endoscope cannot travel the full length of the small intestine, the procedure is very uncomfortable and usually has to be carried out under anesthetic.

After fasting overnight, the patient simply swallows the capsule with some water and is then able to go about his or her normal business while the disposable M2A capsule glides through the intestinal tract just as food would. On its amazing voyage, the capsule, which emits its own light source twice a second, sends out video signals from inside the body to sensors on the skin,

The News in Brief

CANADA

Max Paperman Dies

MONTREAL — Max Paperman, a member of the Montreal family that runs the oldest Jewish funeral home in Canada, died last month. He was 93. Though he started at the funeral home, he worked in the clothing business for most of his adult life. He returned to the family business 18 years ago, and retired from it at age 88.

Environmental Grant

VANCOUVER — A local Jewish environmental group is getting funding from the British Columbia government to provide educational seminars to Jewish students this fall. Adam va-Adamah Jewish Environmental Society, known as AvA, recently received a $6,000 grant from the environment ministry to hire a part-time employee who will conduct seminars and outings for students at Vancouver Talmud Torah.

ISRAEL

Homes Demolished

JERUSALEM — Israeli forces demolished three partially completed Palestinian houses in a refugee camp in eastern Jerusalem last week. Israel said it took the action because the buildings were illegal and unoccupied.

West Nile Virus

JERUSALEM — An 84-year-old Israeli man died last week of a mosquito-transmitted virus that has killed at least seven people in the New York area during the past two summers. Israeli officials said they would increase spraying against mosquitoes, but said the West Nile virus is common in the Middle East and that most Israelis have developed immunity.

Symbol Compromise?

JERUSALEM — A new compromise may allow for Israel's humanitarian aid society to become a member of the International Red Cross. The new emblem for Israel's Magen David Adom organization would be a Jewish star framed in a border. The international group will consider the plan next month.

Trade Stays Flat

JERUSALEM — Trade between Israel and the Palestinian Authority totalled $1 billion (US) during the first half of the year, according to the Federation of Israeli Chambers of Commerce. The total was the same as for the same period during 1999, the group said.

WORLD

Church to Pay

BERLIN — Germany's Roman Catholic Church will pay $2.3 million to compensate Nazi-era forced labourers. But the move has been criticized because the money will not go into a general fund, but rather to labourers employed by the church. Germany's Protestant churches have agreed to pay $4.6 million to the general fund, which was created under an agreement reached by the German government, German businesses and international Jewish groups.

Swiss Contributions

BERN — The Nestlé company will contribute $14.6 million to the $1.25-billion Swiss banks settlement for Holocaust-era claims. The court-appointed lawyer in the settlement is scheduled to devise a plan to distribute the money by Sept. 11. Meantime, six more Swiss firms joined the $5-billion German fund to compensate World War II-era slave and forced labourers. That brings the total number of Swiss firms participating in the fund to 11.

Letter to Lieberman

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League has sent a letter to Joseph Lieberman calling on the U.S. Democratic vice-presidential candidate to keep religion out of the presidential campaign. "Appealing along religious lines, or belief in God, is contrary to the American ideal," said the ADL letter. The letter came a day after Lieberman told an audience at an African American church in Detroit that Americans need to renew the "dedication of our nation and ourselves and to God and God's purpose."

Words from Bush

WASHINGTON — George W. Bush promised members of a Jewish organization a continued "special relationship" between the United States and Israel. But the U.S. Republican presidential candidate told B'nai Brith International's convention via satellite that America should not pressure the Jewish state or interfere with Israel's democratic process. Bush also sounded familiar themes for Jewish groups, including support for the peace process, tolerance of all faiths and moving the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Lawsuit Against Neo-Nazi Group Starts

COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho — White supremacists and Jewish groups massed outside a small courthouse in this northern Idaho city last week for a trial aimed at bankrupting one of the United States' most reviled racist groups.

Scores of police patrolled streets around the court to prevent trouble at the start of a lawsuit that pits the civil rights movement against Aryan Nations, a neo-Nazi group.

Lawyers from the Southern Poverty Law Centre, who have brought the case, and leaders of the Jewish Defence League were under close guard at their hotels.

The case stems from an attack on a mother and her son two years ago by guards at the Aryan Nations compound.

Victoria and Joseph Keenan say they were driving past the compound when their car backfired. Believing a gun had been fired at them, armed guards at the compound chased after the pair and shot at their car.

Eventually, the two were forced into a ditch, where Keenan said one man struck her with the butt of a gun and another struck her son.

If the Keenans prevail in the suit, they could wind up owning the hate group's eight-hectare compound on scenic Hayden Lake, which has been appraised at $203,000 (US).

'The Fonz' helps launch UJA Campaign 2001

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For an audience that knows him primarily as the Fonz, Henry Winkler, keynote speaker at last week's Campaign 2001 launch, was just as big a hit speaking as himself – an energetic 54-year-old Jewish actor, producer and director with grey hair and a self-deprecating sense of humour, dressed impeccably for the occasion in a dark navy suit, white dress shirt and pale pink tie.

Ron Frisch

The black leather jacket he wore as motorcycle-riding Arthur Fonzarelli in the '70s and '80s sitcom, Happy Days, now hangs in the Smithsonian Institute in Washington, D.C.

Winkler's interest in helping children, both through charity work and professionally (having produced a variety of programs for and about kids) tied in with this year's UJA FEDERATION campaign theme, The Campaign for Our Children.

The words are "more than just a marketing theme," said Ron Frisch, campaign co-chair with Ed Sonshine. The campaign goal this year is $45 million, $4 million more than last year, with the extra funds to be earmarked for youth projects. More than $16 million has already been raised, said Sonshine.

The 'quiet charm' of Henry Winkler

An extra half-million dollars is to be dedicated to the rescue of youth from the former Soviet Union, $2.1 million to expand formal and informal Jewish education, and 1.4 million to help immigrant youth and children affected by poverty and domestic violence, Frisch said.

"We are living proof of what dreams can come true," he proclaimed, having noted that 52 years ago, to the week, an emergency UJA meeting was held at the same location, the Royal York Hotel, to ensure the survival of the fledgling State of Israel.

Winkler also spoke of dreams. A depiction of an elderly rabbi at the Kotel, bearing the phrase "If you will it, it is not a dream," was a gift he received during his heyday as Fonzie. It still hangs on his office wall, he said.

He urged the audience of over 1,200 people to make the most of themselves by working on their spiritual, physical and mental development, and to give of themselves, especially to "those who have the most potential and are the most vulnerable.

"If we don't do our part, then something very important will remain undone forever," he said.

His own impact as Fonzie was brought home in a number of stories. In the show's seventh year, Winkler's character said, "Hey Richie, look at this. You can get a library card. They're free. I can take a book home. You can meet chicks there." Registration for library cards in the United States went up 500 percent as a result, Winkler said.

More poignantly, a seven-year-old autistic girl uttered her first word, "Fonz," when she saw Winkler at an arts festival, moving her mother to tears. The following year, her vocabulary had increased by 100 words, he said.

Ed Sonshine

And at a Washington, D.C. event, former Beirut hostage Terry Anderson told Winkler that his guards used to watch Happy Days, which kept the prisoners going as they also watched, through bars. "Who knew?" Winkler asked.

The Sabbath feeling in Venice

From the editor's desk

Two Canadians travelled to Venice with two friends from Venice whom they had met three days before at a mountain retreat in the Italian Alps. The highway was clogged with vehicles inching eastward toward the Adriatic Sea.

The experience of sitting in a car moving very slowly on a road choked by countless other cars moving very slowly on the same road was a familiar one to the Canadians, except that this road led to Venice and it was Friday afternoon and they were starting to feel concerned that the arrival of Shabbat would precede their arrival in Venice.

But the sun stayed in the sky long enough for the weary, excited visitors from Canada and their Venetian hosts to pull their suitcases through the crowded streets, across three canal-spanning bridges, and along the cobbled surfaces of the alleyways of the former Jewish quarter to a modest home in the calle della ghetto novissimo – the "newest" of the three areas comprising the full ghetto in which Jews had always lived in Venice.

A street in the Jewish ghetto today, and then

The ghetto novissimo was established in 1633; the oldest of the three sections, ironically called the ghetto nuovo, was established in 1516; the second area, confusingly called the ghetto vecchio – or old ghetto – was established in 1541.

The exteriors of the buildings tightly abutting each other and the dark, narrow streets remained essentially as they were 400 and more years ago. The home in which the Canadians received Shabbat edged onto a canal on whose immediate opposite side was a small Lubavitch yeshiva.

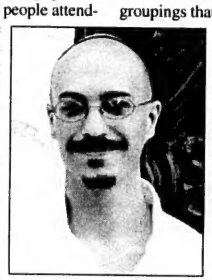
The rolling rhymes of Lecha Dodi emanating from the small group of young men enthusiastically receiving the Shabbat, seemed to skim along the surface of the canal like a finely polished flint sparking a glow of warm, Sabbath feelings in the Jewish hearts visiting across the way.

The next day, the Canadians attended the Sephardi synagogue, one of only three still in use among the five synagogues in the ghetto. In all, about 40 people attended shul that morning. The majority were, like the Canadians, visitors. Joining the Canadians were tourists from New York, Paris, London and Jerusalem.

The rabbi of the congregation, Dr. Roberto Della Rocca, greeted the worshippers in Hebrew and invited them for a kiddush at the nearby Home for the Jewish Aged.

Rabbi Della Rocca made no inquiries prior to his remarks as to the level of familiarity with spoken Hebrew among the worshippers. He assumed an ability at least to understand the language freely if not to actually speak it freely.

The Canadians were fixated upon and absorbed the myriad new, compelling sights and sounds of this four-century old Venetian synagogue, Yet the thought was inescapable that among the many miracles wrought by the young State of Israel and gifted to the all the Jews of the world was the Hebrew language – dramatic, dynamic and revived – as a language of connection between Jew and Jew, as well as a language of connection between Jew and God. How good it felt for them to sit with so interesting and diverse a group of Jews, united in a special feeling, as kinfolk, brethren in a bond of living history.



Nicola Fuochi

Nicola Fuochi is one of the guides at the Jewish Museum in the ghetto. He speaks about the Jewish past and present of Venice with obvious expertise, passion and a dry sense of humour. A tour of the area with him lasts about an hour and focuses on the five synagogues that remain in the ghetto. The synagogues were the centerpieces of the rich communal life that held sway in Venice 400 years ago. Each was built in the 16th century, a spiritual and cultural home to the different Jewish groupings that made their way to the port on the Adriatic: the Great German Synagogue, the Spanish Synagogue, the Canton Synagogue, the Levantine Synagogue and the Italian Synagogue. To this day, according to Fuochi, there are "secret" passageways and tunnels connecting the synagogues.

Moses Montefiore, the fabled philanthropist from London helped to build the Levantine Synagogue.

Approximately 1,200 Jews lived in Venice during World War II. Due in large part to the bravery of the leader of the community who refused to turn over the list of Jewish names to the Nazis, some 1,000 survived.

Today, 466 Jews are registered as members of the Jewish community, although Fuochi believes around 600 Jews actually live there. Like the rest of Italian Jewry, it is a community suffused with a breathtakingly creative and vibrant Jewish past. Its future, however, one hesitates to add, appears uncertain.

Tuition up around 4.5% at Jewish day schools

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The kids are back at their desks this week, and their parents will have to dig a bit deeper to keep them there.

Tuition fees at the 13 Toronto Board of Jewish Education (BJE) schools are up this academic year by an average 4.5 percent over last year.

The increase a year ago over the previous year was 2.5 percent.

The lowest increase this year will be at Associated Hebrew Day Schools (1.5 percent), while the highest (6.3 percent) are in grades 4 to 8 at Netivot Hatorah.

Netivot has split its fee structure this year between the lower and higher grades.

United Synagogue Day Schools did the same thing last year, charging one fee for students in grade 1 and another for all other grades. The increase at USDS this year is five percent for both.

There will be no fee hike at Ner Israel Yeshiva. The increase last year there was 6.4 percent over the year before.

Bernard Shoub, director of school finances at the BJE, said the increase at Beth Jacob High School for Girls is because the student body has shrunk, thanks to the opening of two other Orthodox schools for girls, Bnos Bais Yaakov High School and Tiferes Bais Yaakov High School.

The population of the BJE system is over 11,000 pupils, while another 6,000 are in the supplementary system.

Shoub said it was too early to say how many students will get a subsidized education this year. Last year, roughly 40 percent of students in the BJE system did not pay full fees.

The five-year-old Toronto Heschel School, located in Beth David Synagogue, is affiliated with the BJE ,but receives none of its funding. It does, however, take part in BJE conferences and programs. There too, tuition is staggered along grades, ranging this year from $8,500 to $8,800 – a sharp rise of 11 percent over last year.

The Zareinu Educational Centre for multi-challenged children received a grant of $100,000 from the BJE last year. Shoub said he expects the same amount will be granted to Zareinu this year.

Full fees at Zareinu, which is also affiliated with the BJE, will be $15,750 this year, compared to $15,000 last year.

Asked whether he's comfortable with an average tuition hike of 4.5 percent – which is above the inflation rate – Shoub said, "I'd be a lot more comfortable if we had funds coming from the province."

ADD identified as problem. See pages 14, 15.

The 'quiet charm' of Henry Winkler

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Fonzie – as countless fans of Henry Winkler still think of him – is becoming a familiar face at Jewish federation events.

The New York-born actor, producer and director has spoken on many such occasions over the past three or four years, he told The CJN in a phone interview last Tuesday, prior to his Wednesday night appearance at UJA FEDERATION's campaign launch at the Royal York Hotel.

No stranger to Canada, Winkler filmed the 1979 television movie An American Christmas Carol, in which he played Scrooge, in Elora, Ont. He has also directed commercials in Toronto and worked on productions in Vancouver.

Why the recent Toronto gig? Winkler's reply and tone of voice resonated with a quiet charm reminiscent of Fonzie's manner toward Richie's mother (Marion Ross) on Happy Days, the long-running sitcom for which Winkler garnered three Emmy nominations and two Golden Globe awards.

"You know what I love?" he asked from the office of his Los Angeles company, Fair Dinkum Productions.

"Essentially, I love being in a room with strangers, in so many different places, and so many of them could have been at my bar mitzvah. When you meet a landsman, no matter where in the world, there is this instant understanding that is just a great feeling."

Not to mention that Winkler is "crazy about" children and has been actively involved in children's causes since his teens, when he worked as a counsellor at an after-school program. (This year's UJA campaign theme is The Campaign for Our Children.)

Much of Winkler's work reflects his interest in children, including Fair Dinkum's first television documentary two decades ago, Who Are the DeBolts and Where Did They Get 19 Kids?; a 1984 video, Strong Kids, Safe Kids, dealing with child abuse; and the current Disney series So Weird.

Winkler, now a father of three – stepson Jed, 29, daughter Zoe, 20, and son Max, 17 – grew up with few close relatives, his parents having fled Nazi Germany in 1939.

His mother, Ilse, and father, Harry, president of an international lumber corporation, were among the founding families of Congregation Habonim, a Conservative synagogue in Manhattan, where Winkler, now 54, celebrated his bar mitzvah.

Becoming a parent himself evoked "feelings you had no idea were there, and no idea of the enormity of those feelings."

Becoming an actor was a childhood dream – and a struggle. "If you didn't have a C average, you couldn't be in the play," he said. He remembers being told he was lazy and not living up to his potential.

It wasn't until several years after he earned a Master's degree from the Yale School of Drama that Winkler learned he was dyslexic. He still finds reading "really difficult" and says he works hard at learning scripts.

A recent guest role in The Practice resulted in an Emmy nomination, and on Oct. 19, he opens on Broadway in Neil Simon's The Dinner Party.

Among his other projects, Winkler is working on a digital remake of Everybody's Got a Song, a 1974 film explaining to students with learning challenges "that they're pretty swell, and that just because they learn differently, doesn't mean they're stupid."

He realized once he started that the theme applied to him as well.

Winkler claims to have no idea what made his Happy Days character so immensely popular. Over the course of 255 shows from 1974 to 1984, Arthur Fonzarelli – the leather jacketed, motorcycle-riding high school dropout – was an icon of cool. "It's just incredible. No matter where I go in the world, I'm stopped."

Reflecting on the influence religion has had on his work and life, Winkler said he imagines much of what he does is influenced by the "tenaciousness, compassion and wisdom" of Judaism.

Winkler and Stacey, his wife of over 22 years, belong to a synagogue, but he admitted he is "probably not as active as I want to be or should be."

The next day, when I met him in person, he greeted me warmly, with a hug, as if I had in fact been a guest at his bar mitzvah.

The opportunity that returns to us again

Elul arrived last week. We ushered in the last month of the Jewish lunar calendar before Rosh Hashanah, just as we were ushering out the last few days of summer before the long Labour Day weekend. Perhaps it was a fortuitous confluence of the two streams of time. Perhaps the summer's last extended respite was just the right frame of time and mind in which to contemplate the signficance of the countdown to Rosh Hashanah that begins with Elul.

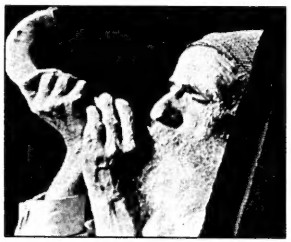
Our ancient sages ascribed specific liturgical customs to Elul. They understood that, just as one must prepare to face judgment in an earthly court, one must also prepare to face judgment in the heavenly court. And inasmuch as Rosh Hashanah is about the judgment by Heaven of our individual lives, the liturgical customs of Elul are aimed at steering our hearts and our minds towards the pages beginning to turn, as it were, in the Book of Judgment on high.

Two of the key customs are the addition of selichot prayers to the morning service – each day of the month for most Sephardi congregations and toward the end of the month for Ashkenazi congregations – and the sounding of the shofar at the end of the morning services.

The selichot prayers are special poems of forgiveness built upon the 13 Divine attributes of mercy that one recites with a minyan. They are intended to help us feel contrition for behaviour in the year drawing to its close, that we may have come to regret.

The sounds of the shofar are intended to serve as a spiritual alarm clock. Together with the penitential poetry of selichot, the blasts of the shofar urge us to "wake up" to the possibilities that have come our way, yet again, to begin the process of measuring who and where we are.

In truth, however, sometimes it takes a bit of courage to do this, because the measurement can fall short of where and who we hoped we might be. But that is also the opportunity Elul brings, namely, the time prior to Rosh Hashanah to find our courage and the opportunity yet again, to do good things with our lives.



LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

CJN missed the story: Cotler

Your front page article, "Israel erred on International Court: Cotler," (CJN, Aug. 24) may have, however inadvertently, mischaracterized my presentation to the annual meeting of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists – while missing the real story – as follows:

First, my talk dealt with the historical significance of the International Criminal Court, the principles underlying it, and the landmark Canadian War Crimes Law, which gives Canada the most comprehensive war crimes legislation in the world. I made no reference in my presentation to the issue of Israel and the ICC.

Second, the reference to the fact that "Israel erred on International Court," which appears as your headline, was in response to a question as to whether Israel should have signed the Rome Treaty to establish an International Criminal Court. I responded that "Israel erred in not signing the Treaty," and added that Israel might well have succeeded in amending the offending provision of the Rome Treaty if its lobbying had begun earlier (in the three years before the Rome ICC Conference), and had involved NGOs and not only governments.

Third, the real headline story is that the Israeli minister of justice, Yossi Beilin, announced shortly thereafter at the conference that Israel would proceed to sign the ICC Treaty.

Re: CHAT – Parent responds to Csillag

...Ron Csillag's column of Aug. 3 cannot go unanswered.

Csillag thinks that we are upset because of the car pools. Though this may be a problem for families with children attending the separate campuses, what upsets us is that this was sprung on us without warning. Our children will be denied a high school experience with their peers, with many of whom they have been going to school since they were four years old. Our children will be denied the facilities that are available to the other CHAT students, and they will not have the experience or social contacts of the mentoring program that were stressed a number of times during the presentations by CHAT.

Most outrageous is Csillag's accusation that the "L" postal code parents' objections to Richmond Hill are racist. To state that we are concerned that a "Baptist church and some Muslim-owned stores will have negative influences" is a total misrepresentation. We were equating the fact that Wilmington students have off-campus facilities available to them across the street from the school. Richmond Hill students will not have that option because there are no appropriate facilities available unless he considers adult video stores and strip joints appropriate.

All of the community's schools are located in areas that have some amount of Jewish presence. There is no Jewish presence in the area of Richmond Hill High School...

Csillag is right about one thing. This was not CHAT's finest hour. The fault lies with CHAT's not having done any appropriate long-term planning. They should have limited the number of children accepted into Grade 9 based on the space available and not tried to accommodate every application...

We were misled. Our children were enticed into CHAT with the false impression that they would be attending Wilmington. The integrity of the administration and the board has been permanently tarnished, and nothing short of the resignation of both the board and the administration will begin the healing process.

All Jews affected by funding

Morton Weinfeld's column, "Hillary, Stock and anti-Semitism" (CJN, Aug. 17), is flawed on two counts. First, he raises the spectre of Stockwell Day's alleged anti-Semitism, a spurious and unsubstantiated claim at best, even by Weinfeld's own admission.

The second flaw is even more disturbing. He claims that "a few ultra-Orthodox Jews in Ontario might be prepared to ignore the allegations of anti-Semitism and support the Alliance." Weinfeld displays a callous lack of concern for the plight of day school parents in Ontario, who are for the most part buckling under heavy financial burdens to pay the very high tuition fees here, where we receive no support at all from the provincial government.

Why does Weinfeld feel it necessary to single out ultra-Orthodox Jews in his column? Certainly the ultra-Orthodox are quite affected by this discriminatory situation, as are middle-of-the-road Orthodox Jews such as myself, Conservative and Reform Jews, and even the many non-religiously affiliated Jews who choose to give their children a day school education. There are enough fine Jewish day schools here in Ontario of all stripes, that no segment of our diverse community is left untouched by this issue.

The fact that Day is apparently the only politician in this country who is willing to commit himself to take action on ending the discriminatory educational funding policies in Ontario certainly makes him worthy of consideration by the Jewish community, and makes any unsubstantiated claims of anti-Semitism pale in comparison.

Mourning and Gender: Women Reciting Kaddish

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ
Special to The CJN

Mourning rituals such as shivah, Yizkor and Kaddish, are well known halachic obligations. But for many mourners, these rituals have a great deal of emotional value as well; they express the mourner's love and concern for a departed family member. Because of this, any halachic question about mourning ritual is sensitive.

For Orthodox Jews, women's issues are also sensitive. Some feel it is necessary to do what is halachically possible to increase the role women play in synagogue life; others, in reaction to this, see any flexibility regarding women's issues as undermining the halachic system.

The halachic question of whether women may say Kaddish lies at the intersection of these two sensitive topics; it is both a women's issue and a mourner's issue. Because of this, it has become the subject of some heated scholarly debate. (Some articles are available in English, including Rabbi Reuven Fink's The Recital of Kaddish by Women in the Journal of Halacha and Contemporary Society (JHCS), no. XXXI; Letters to the editor, JHCS, no. XXXII; Rochelle L. Millen's The Female Voice of Kaddish in Jewish Legal Writings by Women.) This debate is another twist in the history of an unusual prayer.

The nucleus of the Kaddish prayer is the phrase "Yehe sheme rabbah mevorach" (May the name of God be blessed), which is mentioned several times in the Talmud. Some have theorized that the Kaddish was instituted as a response to the destruction of the Temple; it was an attempt to call on God to make His greatness known, and redeem the Jewish people (Aruch Hashulchan, OH 55:1). It is considered to be an exceptional prayer (Berachot 21b), one that can tear up a negative Divine judgment (Shabbat 119b). Initially, Kaddish was recited by the chazzan. The custom for mourners to recite the Kaddish began in medieval Germany (see Or Zarua 2:11), and later spread to Jewish communities around the world.

At present, Kaddish is recited seven times during the morning prayers, and five times during the two evening prayers. About half of the time, it is recited by the chazzan; the rest of the time, it is recited by mourners in the congregation.

The current practice of mourners reciting Kaddish raises some difficulties. The mourner recites Kaddish as a way of increasing the heavenly merit of the deceased (cf. Otzar Midrashim, page 450). However, praying for the dead appears to be illogical; we have a general rule that people are judged for their own actions. We do not judge children by the actions of their parents, nor parents by the actions of their children (Deuteronomy 24:17, Sanhedrin 27b). If this is so, why should a child's recital of Kaddish or Yizkor change a parent's heavenly judgment?

Indeed, because of this problem, some medieval authorities opposed Yizkor and similar prayers (see Encyclopedia Talmudit, s.v. Hazkarat Nishamot). In response, some argue that when a child undertakes to do something, the influence of the parent becomes apparent, and thereby the parent is rewarded. Others simply affirm that God extends clemency to a parent's soul when a child prays on his behalf.

Another difficulty is: What does Kaddish have to do with mourning? The text of the Portrait de Miriam

Moïse Kisling 1891—1953

Kaddish is not a prayer for the dead; it is a prayer exalting the greatness of God. It tells us that God's greatness is beyond human comprehension, greater than any praise man can utter.

Some argue that one of the reasons it was chosen as the mourner's prayer is because of eschatological references in the Kaddish (Ismar Elbogen, Jewish Liturgy: A Comprehensive History, chapter 12a).

The first paragraph of the Kaddish says: "May He give reign to His kingship in your lifetime and your days" a clear allusion to the messianic era. (In the Sephardi version of the Kaddish this is expressed more explicitly: "May He give reign to His kingship, and make His salvation flourish and bring near His Messiah.") Another version of Kaddish (recited at the graveside) talks about "the world which will be renewed, and where God will revive the dead and raise them up to eternal life, and rebuild the city of Jerusalem and complete its sanctuary within it…" The references to the messianic period and the resurrection of the dead made the Kaddish the right prayer for the mourner, a comforting reminder that death is not final.

Once the Kaddish became well established as a mourner's prayer, a new question came to the fore: May women recite the Mourner's Kaddish? This question was asked, on three separate occasions in the late 17th and early 18th centuries, of prominent German rabbis. Rabbi Yair Chaim Bachrach, (Chavot Yair, 1698; Teshuvah 222) when asked about a "strange" and "famous" occurrence in Amsterdam, responded: "About one who was left without a son, and commanded before his death that 10 should gather in his home to study for the 12 months (with pay), and after the study session, his daughter would recite Kaddish, and the rabbis and leaders of the community did not protest. Although I cannot prove this wrong, for a woman is commanded to sanctify God's name (i.e., Kiddush HaShem, and therefore is just as commanded to recite Kaddish which is meant to sanctify God's name -C.S.), and there is a minyan… and it is logical that a daughter's (recital of Kaddish) is purposeful and pleasing for the (father's) soul, for it is his child. However, one should protest for it will weaken Jewish customs, which are also Torah, and everyone will build his own sanctuary according to his own ideas…"

From R. Bachrach's response we see two things: in principle, it is halachically acceptable for a woman to recite the Mourner's Kaddish; however, because a woman reciting Kaddish in public runs counter to custom, it is more important to preserve community customs. Therefore, once it became public knowledge, it would be prohibited for the daughter to continue to recite the Kaddish, even at home. For similar reasons, Rabbi Yechezkel Katzenelenbogen (Knesset Yechezkel, 1731; end of Yoreh Deah) prohibited women from reciting Kaddish, even at home. However, Rabbi Yaakov Reischer (Shevut Yaakov, 1708; II:93) allowed women to recite the Kaddish, only in a private home, because there would be no breach of local customs regarding modesty if it was recited outside of the synagogue. For similar reasons, a recent author, Rabbi Yechiel Michel Tukacshinsky (Gesher HaChayim, 1947; page 226) allows a girl under the age of 12 to recite the Kaddish in the synagogue.

However, times and customs change, and old questions are reconsidered. In the past century, the question of women reciting Kaddish has brought about new debates and new rulings. To some authorities, a women reciting Kaddish remains immodest and inappropriate for the synagogue (Tzitz Eliezer 14:7). Some argue to be lenient, recognizing that a stringent stance can alienate women mourners who want to recite Kaddish. Others take a reactionary stance. They argue that because of the pressure placed on Orthodoxy by feminism, it is necessary to be stringent about women reciting Kaddish. They say "that given the Zeitgeist that prevails today, which serves as an impetus to change our time-honoured laws concerning modesty, identity and role differentiation, this change is both pernicious and dangerous." (Fink, JHCS XXXI, page 37) However, in actuality, in the early 20th century (before the feminist movement), many communities began to allow women of all ages to recite the Kaddish.

In two letters to the editor, (Hadarom 1987, page 157; JHCS no. XXXII, page 105) Rabbi Joel Wolowelsky repeats reports that it was not uncommon for women to recite Kaddish in synagogues in pre-World War II Lithuania, and that several leading rabbis, including Rav Chaim Ozer Grodzenski, approved and recommended the practice.

Rabbi Yoseph Ber Soloveitchik recounted that he found it curious, when visiting Vilna, to find a women reciting Kaddish after Ma'ariv. Investigating, he discovered that this was the prevailing practice in Vilna (see Kenneth Chelst, Kaddish: The Unanswered Cry, footnote 23, and Wolowelsky in JHCS, page 104). After emigrating to America, Rabbi Yoseph Ber Soloveitchik continued to rule that women may say the Mourner's Kaddish, as did his brother, Rabbi Aaron Soloveitchik.

In addition, Rabbi Yoseph Henkin gave the practice of women saying Kaddish a lukewarm endorsement, partially because of the intense significance people give the Mourner's Kaddish. From a recently published responsa (Iggrot Moshe, OH V:12, section 2) it is clear that Rabbi Moshe Feinstein also accepted and endorsed the practice of women reciting the Mourner's Kaddish. It is evident then that the current custom of many synagogues to allow and encourage women to recite the Kaddish has a strong basis in Halachah.

The Kaddish is an attempt to reach out into a different dimension and connect with a person who has passed away. Men and women of all shades of observance find reciting the Kaddish to be deeply spiritual and extremely comforting. As we recite the Kaddish in the synagogue, all of us, both mourner and non-mourner, pray for the time when "death will be swallowed up forever, and God will wipe the tears from every face." (Isaiah 25:8)

Lament for an absent crowd

July 10 was a day of solidarity with the 10 Iranian Jews who had been called before a revolutionary court in Iran. We were to assemble in order to let the Iranian government know that we and many Christian allies were outraged at the judgment of this court of "justice," where the judge was also the prosecutor.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The court handed down its sentence after the accused had been held for many months without a lawyer or access to their families – and the proceeding was held in secret to boot.

When preparing to give a talk at the rally, I could not help but think of two other occasions in which I had the privilege of participating, rallies that galvanized our community: One took place 31 years ago in sub-zero temperatures at Nathan Phillips Square in Toronto, when we protested the execution of 14 Iraqis, including nine Jews. Thousands were in attendance. The other occasion happened two years later in Ottawa, when 10,000 of our people came from all over the country and marched through the streets of our capital chanting: "One, two, three, four, open up the iron door!"

But where were we this time? To be sure, it was summer, but I cannot persuade myself that the date alone was the reason for the relatively sparse attendance. (The Toronto Star spoke of 500; I wish there had been that many.) To be sure, the actual number was not embarrassingly low, and many of those who were present were active members of the community. The media were there, too, but the masses were absent. Why was this so?

Was it because the travesty of justice perpetrated in Iran did not affect us personally? After all, it was an attack on Jews and Judaism, clear and simple. Why did it not seem to touch us?

Is it true what many Israeli say, that the Jewish identity of Diaspora Jewry is already waning? Or may the explanation be due to the biblical warning that ease and well being may erode our sense of responsibility? I have been worried about this for quite some time and our rally confirmed my fears.

However, there was at least one encouraging aspect to the Iranian vigil. The major community organizations joined in common effort – from Canadian Jewish Congress and Federation to B'nai Brith, from religious Orthodoxy to Reform. I will try and remember that part as an encouraging sign that the basic elements of a united community still exist. But without a pervasive sense of responsibility, we are ineffective.

The gathering in front of Old City Hall in Toronto was a warning that the next time around we must do better.

A new voice from the East

So, we're back to that time of year again; a mad rush to get everything organized for the new year before school starts.

With respect to university students, it means many things. Suddenly, we have to do everything now that we should have done when we came home in the spring – doctor's appointments, passport renewals, course selections, etc.

Of course, we also have the last minute haircuts as well as "back to school" shopping to do before we get to school. And, for those travelling far distances for their higher education, we have to get our travel arrangements in order, and hope that Air Canada will not go on strike until after we've arrived at our destinations.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

My name is Darcie Richler, and I am your new source on student happenings in the Atlantic provinces. Entering my third year of study at Dalhousie University in Halifax, I will be majoring in political science/environmental science.

I am the president of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students' Federation (APJSF), and I intend to provide you with an "objective" and "informative" report about what is happening on campuses around the Atlantic region.

This time of year also brings out a somewhat difficult reality for Jewish students who study far away from home. I am referring of course, to the High Holy Days.

In the past, I had always looked forward to this point in the year as an opportunity to spend some much needed time with family, consume large quantities of my mom's fantastic cooking, and have some long weekends too!

In my first year away, I remember dreading the Holy Days, knowing that I would not be at home for any of them.

This put a damper on the excitement of going away, and caused a bad case of homesickness even before I left for school.

However, the biggest and best surprise came when the invitations for lunch, dinner and the breaking of the fast started coming in.

I have attended Camp Kadimah in Lunenburg County, Nova Scotia since 1993. In fact, going there is what triggered my interest in the Maritimes so much that I decided, at the age of 13, that Dalhousie University had to be the best place on earth (by virtue of the fact that it is located in Halifax, N.S.).

In the summer of 1998, my first year on staff at Camp Kadimah, and only a few months before starting first year at Dalhousie, I received all the reassurances I so desperately needed. Visitor's day brought many kind parents from Halifax who eagerly extended invitations to their homes for any part of the High Holy Days.

These same parents also continue to come to me and say "if you ever need anything, do not hesitate to call" or sometimes they simply make a date to have me over for dinner. The best part of it is their sincerity.

When I left Toronto to attend Dalhousie, I had no idea what I was getting into. The Atlantic Jewish communities are filled with the kindest and warmest people that I have ever met. They represent what the word "community" means in its truest form; they take care of each other.

The families here have made my time away from home much easier than I ever anticipated and I speak for many when I say that.

I would personally like to extend a warm welcome to all the new students coming to school this year in the Maritimes; we have a great program in store for you, so please come out and participate. There is a lot to offer in this Jewish community, and I hope that you come out and participate.

If you are in doubt of where to go, you can e-mail the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students' Federation at APJSF@hotmail.com or just attend synagogue. You will be surprised at how welcome you will feel.

Until next month, I hope that you all have a nice transition into the upcoming New Year, and I look forward to providing you with a window into a Jewish student's life in the Atlantic region.

There's more to Winnipeg than the weather

What do Canadians think of first when they hear the name Winnipeg?

"It's so cold there! Does it snow during the summer too?"

Well, maybe not all Canadians have this naive perspective of Winnipeg, but many do. I am here to dispel some of the myths about Winnipeg and to show Canadian Jews that Canada's central city is simply like everywhere else. More importantly, I hope to provide the readers a glimpse of what Jewish life is like in Winnipeg.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

Since I'll be writing about my experiences once a month for the next year or two, it would only be fair to tell the readers a little about myself.

I am in my third year at the University of Winnipeg, music is an integral part of my life, and so is my summer camp, Camp Massad. I am a product of the Jewish education system, graduating from Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in 1998, and I have been and am presently active in various Jewish organizations.

Well, that's me in a paragraph. I'm sure more will be revealed as the months progress. Where to begin?

Winnipeg's Jewish community is a positive environment. Most of my interaction with the Jewish community has been through the school system, in particular Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate.

Joseph Wolinsky embodies many of the qualities that a school should have. It offers a high quality of education, that has been noticed by various universities, and it produces students with a strong work ethic.

The personal attention at JW cannot be matched by any high school and the combination of a Hebrew and English curriculum makes five classes in university a breeze.

Throughout high school we learn Tanach, Hebrew, Jewish law and Jewish history and then culminate our Jewish high school experience with a six-week trip to Israel.

The Jewish youth of Winnipeg is one of the community's great strengths. Besides the Jewish school system, the B'nai Brith Youth Organization is a major influence in integrating teenagers into the community. Among its other achievements, BBYO creates an environment where Jewish youth can interact. This is especially important because many of BBYO's members have never been through the Jewish school system.

For university students, the Jewish Students Association enables Jewish students to participate in activities together, but unlike BBYO, the students are all university age, which means many of them have been out of the Jewish education system for some time.

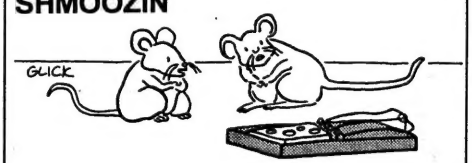
Winnipeg is home to the world renowned Israeli folk dance troupe, the Chai Folk Ensemble. Chai provides an outlet for Jewish teens to dance and sing together. Chai has performed in Mexico and Israel and has put on various shows in Winnipeg, which always bring the community together.

In Winnipeg, we also have the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, which performs plays related to Jewish themes. Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate also puts on plays every two years for the whole community.

Our Jewish community is very active. It can be a place that youth can involve themselves with other Jewish students or it can be explored as a creative outlet, in and of itself. In either case, the community is a supportive and comfortable place.

I hope that I have given the readers a small introduction to Jewish life in Winnipeg, but there is a lot more to divulge, so stay tuned to my monthly column and keep on reading.

SHMOOZIN



"For a plain slice of cheese, it's not worth it. If it was a nice piece of kishke, now that would at least be something to think about."

Germany's fascination with Jews

Zimmes, a three-year-old, hole-in-the-wall restaurant in a secluded nook of Cologne, serves a definite need. Specializing in non-kosher, Jewish-style Eastern European and Israeli food, it is a modest establishment with six tables and some 20 chairs, filled with the soothing melodies of Israeli folk songs from a more innocent era. It caters to a niche market drawn to Jewish cuisine and fascinated by Jewish culture, music, religion and history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

"Jewishness is hip in Germany today," said Michael Barg, the non-Jewish owner of Zimmes, found at 22 Rathenauplatz. The square is named after Walther Rathenau, Germany's first and only Jewish foreign minister. He was gunned down in Berlin in 1922 by an anti-Semitic zealot who despised the Weimar Republic.

Fifty-five years after the collapse of a Nazi regime which set out to eradicate the Jews of Germany and the rest of Europe, it is strange, if not somewhat surrealistic, to discover that things Jewish appeal to a segment of Germany's 82 million-strong population.

"Pick up any German newspaper and you'll likely find a story about a Jewish topic," said an American Jew who has lived in Germany for the past several years and prefers to remain anonymous.

"It may be about the Holocaust memorial the federal government is planning to build in Berlin. It could be about Berlin's Jewish Museum. It may be a book review, or a report from Israel. It's really extraordinary, considering that most Germans have never met, and probably never will meet, a Jew."

Despite the fact that precious few Germans encounter Jews on a personal basis, Eva Soderman, a spokesperson for the Jewish Museum in Berlin, feels that there is a "great curiosity" about them.

Susan Stern, a resident of Germany for the last three decades, warns that the proliferation of stories about Jews in the media creates a misleading impression among the vast majority of Germans. "They think that there are millions of Jews in Germany," said Stern, a writer. "They haven't really figured out who Jews are."

Georg Heuberger, the director of Frankfurt's Jewish Museum, whose Polish-born Jewish parents settled in Germany after World War II, believes that this fascination transcends the press. "You see it in books, movies, television programs and scholarly conferences," he observed.

Annette Haller, a specialist in early modern German Jewish history, disclosed that German scholars annually produce 100 to 150 doctoral dissertations on Jewish themes.

Monika Hebbinghaus, a 28-year-old freelance broadcast journalist who lives in Cologne and holds a diploma in Jewish studies from Oxford University, is familiar with this broad trend. Her boyfriend, Gregor, is currently writing a PhD on 19th-century German Jewish academics.

She describes it as an intellectually fashionable and politically correct tendency. But is it merely a fad? "We'll see," she said non-committally.

Haller, the managing director of Cologne's Germanica Judaica, a library stocked with 60,000 books on Jewish themes, said that German publishers release upwards of 1,000 titles on Jewish topics in any given year.

The profit motive is important, of course, but at least two other variables must be factored into the equation – an attraction to the exotic and a sense of guilt over the Nazis' treatment of Jews.

A Jewish restaurant in eastern Berlin.

Heuberger argues that Protestant and Roman Catholic theologians who sought a dialogue with Jews played a vital role in this phenomenon.

In his opinion, the main "consumers" of Jewish culture in contemporary Germany were born after the war. And their interest in it is does not stem from guilt, he said, referring to the dark period from 1933 to 1945.

This fascination, in essence, may be a kind of philo-Semitism. "Some people claim that philo-Semitism is the flip side of anti-Semitism," said the American observer. "I don't agree. Philo-Semitism is good."

Heuberger concurs. "A knowledge of Judaism and of Jews can only be beneficial. It is an antidote to intolerance. We live in the shadow of the past."

Haller, however, does not think that philo-Semitism is necessarily conducive to fostering "normal" Jewish-German relations. "There is still a lot of unease in the relationship, such as when a German discovers that the person he or she is speaking to is a Jew. Germans don't know Jews and their customs."

In one last telling point, she noted: "As long as there are police patrols in front of synagogues in Germany, I say there cannot be normal relations between Germans and Jews. Yet, when I look at the younger generation, I am optimistic."

Jewish studies in Germany

German universities have discovered Jewish studies. Throughout Germany, chairs in Jewish history, culture and religion have sprouted, particularly in the past decade. By one estimate, 12 universities currently offer Jewish studies programs up to the PhD level. Most students pursuing them are non-Jews.

According to Michael Brenner, a 36-year-old scholar at Munich's Ludwig Maximilians University, Jewish studies chairs have been established in cities ranging from Berlin, Duisberg and Heidelberg to Cologne, Frankfurt and Leipzig.

In his estimation, there are upwards of 20 such chairs, about half of whom are held by gentiles.

Brenner, a Jew born in the Bavarian town of Weiden, studied in Heidelberg, Jerusalem and New York City, taught at Brandeis University and Indiana University, and joined Ludwig Maximilians in 1997.

Among his publications are The Renaissance of Jewish Culture in Weimar Germany and After the Holocaust: Rebuilding Jewish Lives in Post-War Germany.

Martin Buber taught religion at Frankfurt University prior to the rise of Adolf Hitler. Yet Jewish studies, as opposed to rabbinics, were unknown in Germany before World War II, Brenner said.

Germany's first chairs in Jewish studies, in the 1960s, were primarily created to meet the needs of theology students, he added.

Brenner, whose father is a Polish Jew and whose mother is a German Jew from Dresden, said that he would have happily remained in the United States had Ludwig Maximilians University not offered him a position at its new Institute for Jewish History and Culture.

He is reasonably at home in Germany, but would feel more comfortable in a multi-cultural Germany integrated into a united Europe.

A trip with Einstein's brain

Driving Mr. Albert: A Trip Across America With Einstein's Brain* by Michael Paterniti, Random House, $28.95

In April 1955, pathologist Thomas Harvey performed an autopsy on Albert Einstein's body in Princeton, N.J. Without authorization, he removed the Nobel laureate's brain, dissected it into many pieces, and preserved them at his home for 40 years in a jar filled with formaldehyde.

From time to time, Harvey distributed bits and pieces of the brain to eager researchers, including Dr. Sandra Witelson at McMaster University. When Harvey visited Hamilton some years ago, Witelson helped organize his mass of articles about the brain into a scrapbook.

Harvey, who admired Witelson's work, referred to her as "a real firecracker" and predicted that her pioneering research would be significant and far-reaching. Indeed, her article in The Lancet on the brain indicated variations that explained Einstein's mathematical ability and spatial reasoning, and the interconnection of neurons that may have allowed the scientist's brain to work more effectively.

Recently, at the age of 84, Harvey decided – for reasons that remain obscure – to visit Einstein's granddaughter in Berkely, Calif. A young, enterprising journalist named Michael Paterniti who was visiting Harvey at the time, volunteered to serve as chauffeur for the long and tedious car trip from New Jersey to the Pacific coast.

Books
Bernard Baskin

What an opportunity this was for an astonishing story – a journey cross-country with the brain of the most famous scientist of the 20th century sloshing about in a tupperware bowl, packed inside a duffel bag, in the trunk of a rented Buick Skylark.

Harvey's personality proved to be quite a riddle. During the 11-day trip his young companion found him resilient, tenacious and obstinate, refusing to allow him even a quick look at the cars' precious cargo.

Paterniti writes, "This hits me hard. I've driven 2,000 miles – no, I've chauffeured for 2,000 miles, I've made arrangements at hotels and motels, I've escorted the good doctor through restaurants and museums, I've watched over him like a bodyguard as we've made our way toward Evelyn Einstein – and not been allowed so much as a peek at the brain. Meanwhile, my friends doing nothing but being their friendly selves, got to see it within a few hours of meeting the old man."

Paterniti relates how he accompanied Harvey on a museum tour in Los Alomas, shared in his reunion with the famous author, William Burroughs in Kansas, and was at his side when he addressed a group of high school students in San Jose. His meeting with Einstein's granddaughter turned out to be flat and without drama.

This slender volume (a shorter version appeared as a magazine article in Harper's magazine) is replete with information about Einstein's life and achievements. It includes the author's comments and observations on his experiences during the trip – from motels visited, to food ingested, to the magic of the road and the particular American ethos.

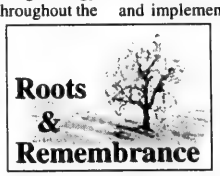
At times Paterniti can be somewhat flippant and irreverent and not quick to treat Harvey with proper regard. He is, however, a splendid writer whose multi-dimensional prose encompasses telling detail, colourful anecdote and philosophical musings.

Part travelogue, part biography and part meditation, Driving Mr. Albert must be regarded as one of the most bizarre road trips in modern literature.

Genealogy project wins award

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

In an ideal world, – the practice of researching one's family tree and learning about Jewish family heritage – is not something that should be confined to persons of middle years and older. Rather, the tools of genealogy should be disseminated throughout the Jewish schools, to give young people the opportunity to enrich their identities with knowledge of family history.



Several years ago, the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto division) presented this argument to the action committee for Jewish continuity of the UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto. Recognizing an opportunity to strengthen Jewish identity among the young, the federation agreed to fund the society's Jewish Youth Genealogy Project.

This summer in Salt Lake City, the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies (IAJGS) presented an award to the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto division) for its innovative youth project.

The Society – and, in essence, the Federation that backed it – were honoured by the world body for "creat[ing] the potential to expose over 40,000 children annually to Jewish genealogy and their heritage as part of the family tree of the Jewish people."

The award citation read: "You have raised funds, developed an introductory guide and introduced it into Jewish schools throughout the Toronto area. The conceptualization and implementation of this outstanding project has the potential to create the Jewish genealogists of the future, raise public awareness of Jewish genealogy, and sets an example for all Jewish genealogical societies of the world."

Volunteers of the Toronto society assembled a 70-page genealogical guide, or "binder", which contains various articles on the basics of genealogical research, Holocaust research, local "landsmanschaft" societies, how to read the Hebrew on ketubot (marriage contracts) and tombstones, and how to obtain various documents from the government.

The binder also includes articles on Canadian censuses, Jewish immigration to Canada, Jews in the Canadian military, and how to store and preserve old documents. There is also a basic bibliography and a summary of items in the society's library. At least 100 copies were distributed to Jewish schools and synagogues throughout the Greater Toronto area.

The IAJGS consists of more than 60 societies worldwide, most of them in the United States. "Many people have phoned us, requesting a copy of the binder," says Henry Wellisch, former president of the Toronto society. "However, it's specifically focused on Canadian research. For Americans, it would have to be extensively adapted."

Wellisch also notes that the binder, which was completed several years ago, has one significant omission: it contains no information about the Internet, which has become a predominant source for genealogical research.

Gary Stein, a vice-president of the Toronto society and the only Canadian on the IAJGS board of directors, was obliged to disqualify himself when the board was considering the merits of the Toronto project. "The awards committee was just blown away by the whole idea of this," he says. "Targeting a program at youth is a great concept, because genealogy is something people usually get into when they're older."

President Gert Rogers, who accepted the award on behalf of the society, thanked Howard Markus, who headed the project, the federation's action committee for Jewish continuity, and the volunteers who contributed to the guide's success: Glen Ecker, Valerie Fox, Larry Gaum, Judi Ghert, Dulcey Hoffman, Rolf Lederer, Harold Nissenthal, Debbie Pekilis, Stephen Speisman, Leslie Train, and Henry Wellisch.

More Jewish calendar sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

We are now well into the month of Elul, the last month of the year preceding Rosh Hashanah. This is traditionally a time to take stock of our conduct during the past year, look at our goals for the coming one, and of course, pick up a new Jewish calendar. You can get a calendar the old fashioned way by walking into your nearest Judaica store or bakery. Or you can do it by travelling on the Jewish Highway.

There are two basic kinds of calendar programs on the Internet. Some programs are built right into a World Wide Web page. Typically, you type in the information you want, hit enter and you get your response. There are also some calendar programs you can download onto your computer and use whenever you want. These programs are usually more sophisticated and may or may not be free.

The Orthodox Union gives you an annotated guide to the year to come [http://www.ou.org/calendar/5761/]. The listing for each holiday explains its historical significance, work restrictions and whether the observance varies inside and outside Israel. You can combine that calendar information with the chart at the B'nai Brith site which gives the dates for all those major holidays until 2006 [http://bnaibrith.org/caln.html].

The Ezras Torah foundation is known for its information-packed calendars. Its calendar is now available online [http://www.ezrasto rah.org/calendar.htm]. The benefit of this calendar is the detailed explanation of major holiday-related customs for the coming year and specific notes about possible exceptions. For example, next year when the first day of Sukkot falls on Shabbat, we are reminded not to wave the lulav.

For a different kind of calendar, you may be interested in taking a look at what happened on This Month in Jewish History [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/hst.htm]. Click on a month and a date to check out what significant Jewish events happened. For example, click on Sept. 9, and you'll learn that on that date in 1609 (18 Elul, 5369), Judah Loew ben Bezalel died. Ben Bezalel is better known as the Maharal of Prague, legendary creator of the Golem, who made a man of clay and put God's name into him, giving him life.

There are many calendar programs you can purchase. Here is a small sample. Joseph Kohn's Hebrew Calendar [http://www.calendar-maven.com/] is a sophisticated program for Windows. You can double-check the Jewish date you were born on, look up a yahrzeit date or figure out when a bar or bat mitzvah is going to fall. You can even enter your time zone, latitude, longitude and elevation in order to see accurate candlelighting times! You can also download Kaluach [http://www.kaluach.org] and Jewish Calendar [http://members.aol.com/jgraff/jcal.htm].

Ulrich Greve's Jewish Calendar [http://www.tichnut.de/jewish/] works with both Windows and Macs as does HaYom On-line Hebrew Calendar [http://world.std.com/~reinhold/dir/].

Do you ever need to check today's Hebrew Date? There are many online pages that will do the trick, such as this one from Prof. Michael Zucker's site [http://www.ibc.wustl.edu/~zuker/hebdate/]. How about double checking your Hebrew birthdate or yahrzeit? No problem with the Interactive Perpetual Jewish Calendar [http://www.jewishpeople.com/cgi-bin/jewish-cal.cgi]. Just type in the year, click on the English month and your answer appears on the screen. The Perpetual Jewish/Civil Calendar [http://www.uwm.edu/cgi-bin/corre/calendar] lets you create two parallel calendars with the Jewish months on the left and the civil months on the right.

Those calendars will all do the job, but my favourites are the calendars created by Havienu L'Shalom in University City, Missouri [http://www.havienu.org/html/Living/calendars.html]. You can generate and print a calendar complete with the Omer count, holidays and Shabbat readings. Click on your city's name (or enter your longitude and latitude) and the calendar will even calculate local candlelighting and Havdalah times. Please note there may be some discrepancy between Havienu's candlelighting times and the one supplied by your neighbourhood synagogue.

The Sephardi factor

By RABBI YECHIEL BEN AYON

For a thousand years, Ashkenazim and Sephardim lived geographically apart.

But Jewish populations have experienced a major shuffle. In our century, with the destruction of European Jewry, the rebirth of the State of Israel and the subsequent mass migration of Jews from Arab lands we find ourselves together.

Is there really any difference between us?

Two recent headline events would seem to say, yes there is: one, the election of Moshe Katsav as president of the State of Israel over the elder statesman, two-time prime minister and Nobel Prize laureate, Shimon Peres; and two, the statement by Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, offering theological rationale for the Holocaust.

All the coverage and commentary surrounding both events took serious notice of the Sephardi factor.

The presidency of Katzav was immediately touted as the shattering of a glass ceiling that had kept the Sephardim at bay. (This is similar to what is being said of the Democratic party's nomination of Joseph Lieberman for the vice-presidency of the United States.)

Glass is, of course, a presence; only you don't see it. Shattering a glass ceiling is to say there is a difference; only it no longer matters – like Joseph Lieberman expressing his Jewishness and continuing to state that it is a non-issue because the level of sophistication of the American people and politics is such that it simply doesn't matter.

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, former Sephardi chief rabbi, leader of the Shas party and major Middle East power broker, makes a theoretic justification for the existence of a God in light of the Holocaust: All six million martyrs, the innocent, the pious and the children, all were reincarnates and in need of atonement for sins of a previous reincarnation.

The world doesn't understand and howls with indignation. The rabbi then clarifies himself by declaring the "sanctity and purity" of every single martyr, and the world only finds itself further from understanding.

Whatever one wishes to make of these statements, one thing is clear: The theological statements made by this rabbi are heard. They may be scrutinized and criticized, but Rabbi Yosef is today on a level of his own. A level that no other single rabbi, certainly not of Sephardi origin has realized in recent past. Yet another glass ceiling shattered.

Israel is a land where 40 percent of marriages are Ashkenazi to Sephardi, where the economic divide between the two was bridged last year for the first time.

While there is still significant distance that needs to be travelled, it is a place where the cultural baggage amassed in the respective Diasporas of the two groups, meets. It is an arena where they are quickly evolving into a single and fused entity.

At work is social evolution, no different from the merging of customs of Jews of Polish and Hungarian decent when they were no longer in Poland or Hungary.

Ashkenazi and Sephardi differences need to be seen for what they are – geographic and historic influences on things such as culture, language and food. Israel is a land where a knish or a falafel can be had from the same stand. More often than not it will be a pizza stand.

Ritalin: Teacher's little helpers?

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — If Dennis the Menace or Huckleberry Finn were in school today, they would probably be on Ritalin.

Ritalin is a medication often prescribed for children with Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD). The Health of Canada's Children, an August report by the Canadian Institute of Child Health, notes that the number of Ritalin pills dispensed in Canada more than doubled between 1994 and 1998.

ADD is a term used to describe children who are inattentive, impulsive and restless, said Dr. Russell Schachar, a clinical psychiatrist at the Hospital for Sick Kids. "And it tends to impact on children, primarily but not exclusively, in the school environment."

In our schools today, those three characteristics do not represent a good learning style, Schachar said.

In an interview, Schachar said that different kinds of learning styles, or disabilities, can adversely impact on children.

"For some children, it's perfectly natural to sit still, pay attention and get 100 percent in school. And for other kids, it's a great struggle.

"But it's important for us as a community to understand, support, care for and nurture all of our children," Schachar said.

The increase in ADD, he said, has a lot to do with the fact that the criteria for this disorder have become broader, and as a result, more children qualify for the diagnosis.

"The other changes which account for a push to make the diagnosis could possibly have to do with changes in school... There are fewer resources available to children with special needs in learning and behaviour, and that would push people – schools, families – more into the hands of professionals outside the school system.

"Though it's clear that medication works in a lot of ways, as an individual within a community, I am equally concerned by the need to provide.excellent schools and excellent social services so that people have other options," Schachar said.

Dr. Gabor Maté, a family physician, argues in his new book, Scattered Minds, that parents need to become more aware of how the parent-child relationship works and how it can be used to promote positive development in the face of ADD.

In an interview, Maté said he believes the disorder is caused by a combination of genetic and environmental conditions.

"People with ADD are hypersensitive... it is how they were born... That, primarily, is what is hereditary about ADD."

However, according to Maté, environment also plays a role in the development of the disorder in the first few years of a baby's life.

In his book, Maté tells the story of his own stressful first few years of life growing up in a Jewish family in Budapest during the Nazi occupation.

His mother's stress, Maté writes, prevented the development of positive bonding between infant and mother and impeded the growth of brain circuits. This provided the groundwork for his own ADD.

The children of Holocaust survivors may be especially prone to passing ADD to their own sensitive kids, Maté said.

However, once a diagnosis is made, a change in the stressful relationship between the child and the parents can promote positive neurological growth. But parents need to learn how to build relationships with their children based on an understanding of the symptoms and characteristics of ADD.

Parents and schools need to work together, Maté said.

"In schools today, teacher training has neglected the systematic study of attention deficit disorder.

"Creative minds working in education need to apply themselves, not to trying to fit the students into the schools, but to fashioning the schools around the needs of the children," Maté said.

"The most serious problem with the widespread use of medications... is that very often – probably in the vast majority of cases – they are the only form of intervention consistently pursued. Yet, in themselves, they do not promote long-term positive changes. When children... stop taking them, they find that none of their problems have gone away."

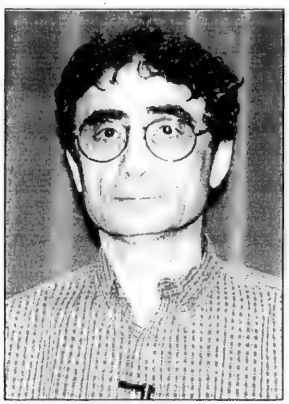
Often, a diagnosis of ADD is based on information passed on by teachers and parents. However, the symptoms could be signs of other problems, said Otto Weininger, a professor of child psychology and educational theory at OISE at the University of Toronto.

For example, children who are anxious about their parents' marital problems could exhibit signs of ADD, without actually having the disorder.

In this case, the child would be put on Ritalin. However, if the problems at home continue, the child wouldn't be able to deal with the issues while their behaviour was being controlled by the medication.

"This could lead to much more serious problems down the road."

In all cases, Weininger said, Ritalin should never be prescribed without counselling for the child and the parents.



Dr. Gabor Maté

They need skills, not pills, Schachar said. "Even in those kids where their behaviour has improved with stimulant medication, there is very little evidence, almost no evidence, that they learn better."

The report on Canada's children notes that "Ritalin does not... eliminate the need for responsive, flexible teaching skills that respect the different learning styles of children."

You may need to give pills to help the child be ready for educational intervention, but the intervention has to take place as well, Schachar said.

We also have to look critically at our school system, especially the Hebrew schools, he said. "We have a collective responsibility to solve these issues.

"All too often, we misread these children and use coercive management and parenting strategies on the grounds that you don't think that these children feel anything.

"However, a huge number of these children take everything to heart, he said, and their self-esteem is vulnerable. When negative discipline is used, the problem just gets worse and the cycle escalates.

"It's often difficult for teachers to deliver what they know is best. Some of it has to do with class size. Some of it has to do with the culture and climate that's set up in the schools by the principals, the vice-principals, the department heads and the boards.

"Some of it is, sadly, a reflection of what we as a community believe – because we are the boards of these schools. We hire the principals and the vice-principals. We set the tone of the schools.

"We have to value every single child," he said. "While this view is true in the broad community, it's completely, incontestably, true in the Jewish community. That's our cultural and spiritual and religious belief.

"There's no place in schools of any kind, least of all in the Jewish school system, for raising your voice, rudeness, sending a child out of the classroom, or forcing a child to tears. There's no excuse for that. It should not be allowed.

"But it does happen in all schools: That sentiment, wherever it resides – from the janitorial staff to the classroom teacher to the management of the school – it needs to be identified and changed."

TORONTO — When three of Aaron Feuerstein's factories were destroyed in a fire, he continued to pay his employees, even though he had no legal obligation to do so.

Feuerstein is chair and CEO of Malden Mills in Lawrence, Mass., which makes Polartec, a synthetic fleece used to make outerwear. His generous act cost him over $10 million.

He will be one of three speakers at Money, Morality and the Marketplace, a program on business ethics to be held at 7:30 p.m. on Sept. 17 at Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz synagogue on Overbrook in Downsview.

Rabbi Aaron Levine and Professor Halina Bitensky of Yeshiva University in New York, will speak on Taxes and Truth Telling; how one can use the Torah to navigate the complex ethical issues faced in business today.

Meir Tamari, founding director of the Business Ethics and Social Responsibility Centre at the Jerusalem College of Technology, and former chief economist in the office of the governor of the Bank of Israel, will speak on Commerce, Competition and Compassion; how an ancient system of law can help shape the new economy.

Moderators and co-chairs of the evening will be Rabbi Jay Kelman, and Mark Schwartz, lecturer of business ethics at The Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania.

On Sept. 18, there will be a follow-up luncheon, sponsored by York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and UJA FEDERATION.

Jewish Free Loan Cassa to mark 75th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rose Ziner says her life has been filled with miracles.

As a result, she has become a philanthropist and committed community volunteer. She will be honoured at the 75th anniversary celebration of the Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, which has provided interest-free loans to thousands of families.

On Sept 20, at the Adath Israel Synagogue, the organization known as Cassa will hold A Rose With a Heart gala dinner to mark the three-quarters of a century that the organization has made significant changes in the lives of their clients.

Cassa will be "honouring Rose Ziner for a lifetime of commitment to our agency and to the Jewish community at large," says Cassa president Cathie Smith Friedman.

Rose Ziner

Ziner, a past president of Cassa, knows well the hardships that come with deprivation, abuse and imprisonment. Her personal experiences have enhanced her desire to help others wherever she can.

Born into an Orthodox family in Budapest, Hungary, as a young student she wanted to be a doctor. When Hitler's decrees closed the door to Jewish students, she went to work in a lumber company.

At the company, she met a major lumber supplier, John Ziner, who later became her business partner and then her husband.

During World War II, she refused to wear the Jewish Star which created serious problems.

But this was when the miracles began, she says. She saved her father by brazenly walking through two cordons of Nazis, one German the other Hungarian.

She was arrested for not having the proper papers. At the police station, a Hungarian policeman who knew her created a story claiming that she was a notorious spy. He said he had to take her to the Gestapo headquarters, but he then took her to his home, and later, to a safe hiding place.

Nevertheless, at a later date, she was caught and incarcerated in Kistarcsa. In jail, destiny brought Rose and John, who had also been imprisoned, together again, but she was shifted to other detention areas.

In 1945, after the war, Rose and John established a successful lumber business in Hungary. They married in 1948.

The following year, they were arrested again, this time by the Russian and Hungarian Communists who had taken over Hungary.

John had been accused of spying for the Americans. Rose was offered a position as mayor of a small city if she would betray John. When she refused, they both ended up in jail and they were to be sent to a gulag, but they bribed their way out.

After their release, they obtained false passports, and went to Vienna, Switzerland and Trieste. In 1951, they were accepted as immigrants to Canada.

"We came to Toronto because the person ahead of us in line was going to Toronto," Rose says.

Rose was employed as a domestic and a nurse's aide at the Jewish Old Folks Home, and she threw herself into work and community projects.

As a volunteer, she worked with new immigrants during the Hungarian revolution, and later became active with the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society, where she served as vice-president; the Jewish National Fund, where she served as chair and is currently honorary chair; and other organizations – Beit Halochem, Yaad Vashem and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee.

Along with her communal involvements, she continues to be an active participant in the family's lumber business, Network Forest Products, now a public company on the NASDAQ exchange.

Three years ago, her husband died. Their son Bobby is the president of the company. Daughter Vivienne is a developer, a partner with her husband Glenmorris Cohen at UrbanQest, Inc.

Like Ziner, Cassa extends a helping hand, Smith Friedman says. "We have provided loans [for purposes] ranging from life threatening to life enhancing circumstances.

"We have so often helped people over life's hurdles, where a personal loan means having the ability to provide food, clothing and shelter, or where interest-free loans have been provided to spouses and children needing to escape from abusive environments."

She adds that new immigrants have been assisted in many ways and educational loans help students to graduate in their chosen fields.

Deputy Prime Minister to be honoured by ORT

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Deputy Prime Minister of Canada Herb Gray will be the honouree at the 26th Golden Circle Luncheon, ORT Canada, Toronto region.

The luncheon is dedicated to honour individuals who have dedicated their lives to the improvement of the human condition, said Helen Marr, co-chair of the luncheon.

"I am delighted to encourage the work of ORT – the largest non government education training organization in the world," Gray said in a telephone interview from Ottawa.

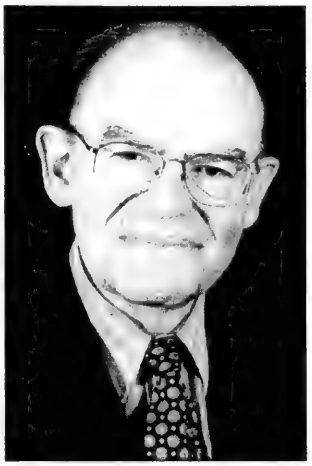
"I am impressed by the way ORT educates and trains both Jewish and non-Jewish students, providing them with skills for today's technological world – the way they give people skills to help themselves to be self-sufficient."

Born and raised in Windsor, Ont., Gray graduated from McGill University and Osgoode Hall Law School. He was first elected to Parliament in 1962 and has been re-elected in all subsequent federal elections to represent his Windsor riding.

As a member of Parliament, he held many positions before being appointed House leader and then solicitor general of Canada in 1993.

On June 11, 1997, he was appointed deputy prime minister and later that year, he was assigned the responsibility of co-ordinating the government's activities to mark the new millennium.

Prior to his election to Parliament, Gray was active in the Windsor community. He attended the Peretz Shula and belonged to B'nai Brith. The family retains a membership in Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue.



Herb Gray

Gray is married to Sharon Sholzberg, a lawyer, and they have two children David and Elizabeth. In Ottawa, they are members of Machzikei Hadas Synagogue.

Gray is being honoured, said Ruth Druxerman, co-chair of the Golden Circle luncheon, for more than 40 years of public service.

Gord Berger, president of Toronto ORT, said that "a major portion of our fund-raising efforts from the Golden Circle Luncheon will go to support our upcoming Youth Technology and Study Skills Program in Toronto."

Berger said that this past year, ORT Toronto established its first program assisting 24 underprivileged children in computer technology. The results of the first year's operation of the program "have been nothing less than remarkable. Grades and behaviour have begun to show marked improvement."

He credited the federal government Millennium Partnership Grant and private and corporate donations, which, this year, will enable 40 children from disadvantaged families in grades 6 and 7 to receive a home computer, weekly after-school instruction, mentoring support and transportation as well as a hot dinner.

Berger added that additional funds received from bequests will be sent to help a school upgrade its computer laboratory in Odessa, in the former Soviet Union.

The luncheon will be held on Oct. 12 at the home of Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman.

Since its inception in Russia 120 years ago, ORT has educated more than three million people in vocational and technology schools and programs in 60 countries.

Elaine Dembe, author of Use the Good Dishes .

Finding joy from the little things in life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ask Elaine Dembe her philosophy of life and she'll sum it up in four words – use the good dishes.

Dembe, a chiropractor, motivational speaker and author of Use the Good Dishes (Macmillan Books Canada), says that not enough people find joy in everyday living.

"We should find joy in the present, but too many of us are in the future or the past. We wait for something to happen before we can be happy, or else we have regrets or 'if only's'.

"If we are constantly waiting for tomorrow or going over things that happened yesterday, then we miss everything that is going on around us. We won't see the sunrise, and we won't see the gold reflected in the office buildings at sunset.

"We also talk and not listen. We may be physically in a room with other people, but we really won't be there."

People have to learn to be good to themselves, says Dembe. "We have to rip the plastic off our couches and feel the fabric. We have to pay attention and be mindful of our senses – what the air feels like or how a flower smells."

As part of her research for the book, she says, she asked hundreds of people what brought them joy. "I was touched by the small things that make people smile. They really do not need a lot to make them happy."

Our lives need to be simplified both physically and emotionally, says Dembe. "We need material things, but how much is enough? Instead of thinking about what we have acquired, we should think about what memories we have made. When we wake up in the morning, we should ask ourselves what we are going to enjoy today."

We may also be burdened by too many people, she says. "As we age, we do not have to take with all our friends; there are some that can be left behind. We have to ask ourselves if our life is enhanced or diminished by certain people. We may discover that some are just too energy draining."

What we have to do is "value the process and not the destination. We learn the most from taking the small steps that take us to a certain point. We should not be in such a hurry to get somewhere. We should enjoy every step along the way, and do some exploring."

It takes courage to extend our boundaries, says Dembe, but we experience joy when we "colour outside the lines – do something we've never done before."

The most joyful people are those who can adapt to new situations, she says. "They accept what cannot be changed, and they are able to find joy by remembering [people they have lost.]

"We need to find meaning and purpose in pain and loss. If we open our hearts, we can be joyful even when we are sad."

Family rituals and traditions are not mindless routines, says Dembe, they give life meaning and harmony; they are life's fabric.

Too many people sleepwalk through life, she says. "It is there for all of us. We have to open our eyes, our hearts, and our minds; then we will be joyful."

5760 – An interesting year

By JEFF ROSEN
News & Internet Editor

Welcome back. I hope everyone enjoyed the summer, didn't work too hard, and is prepared for another year of schedules, commitments and other fun stuff.

Opinion

Hard to realize that another year has rolled by. Fall is just around the corner and soon after that, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and the other holidays.

Overall, it's been an interesting and busy year, both personally and professionally. In the past few months, I've attended one engagement party and three weddings, all of which I attribute to the excitement surrounding the new millennium.

As most of you who regularly browse the paper's Web site knows, The CJN Internet changed this past summer.

While we maintained the "clean" look that we started with over two years ago, we decided to give it a more modern appearance. I would like to think our revised version is even more appealing and will attract even more viewers than before. As well, we are now welcoming all advertisers to come and take part in our site.

When we started this project, we said it would be a work in progress. We stand by that statement. Anything less would result in stagnation and a product that is anything but our best effort.

On the international stage, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat met, in an attempt to hammer out a final peace deal. Unfortunately, they could not come to an agreement. However, just by agreeing to meet and put key issues on the table, they opened doors that will hopefully bode well for future discussions.

Whatever the outcome, we must remember that, for us as Diaspora Jews, Israel is our spiritual homeland. But, for those living and working in the Holy Land, it is their true home. Whatever solutions are found must be first and foremost agreeable to all residents of the region. If the outcome is one that suits our wants and needs – great! It will be a bonus. However, our needs are not and should not be primary.

Water problems surfaced in Ontario

Elsewhere on the international front – this time closer to home – Americans have launched another presidential race. Will it be Gore or Bush, Lieberman or Cheney? It's fascinating to watch, not only the actual day to day coverage, but the amount of play our media give it. Would Canadian political affairs ever come close to such excitement?

Speaking of the local scene, we've had quite a summer as well. All of a sudden, something we have taken for granted all our lives has been proven unsafe in many areas.

I'm talking about water.

As much as we would like to, we cannot put all the blame on our perfect, tiny Tory government. This problem has probably been building for many years. However, no one did much to solve the problem once it came to light.

Oh yes, I almost forgot. They did hire a new PR director and gave Walkerton a loan to help them solve their problems. Thank goodness, we have Mike and his boys to help us.

Nothing much has happened recently at the federal level, except that Prime Minister Jean Chrétien stopped cycling and kayaking long enough to get a pie thrown in his face.

How did Canadians react to the news? In a typically Canadian way, of course. We laughed about it the first day and forgot it the next.

Now imagine how different the story would have been in another country. Americans would be demanding the death sentence for the pie thrower and debating conspiracy theories from now until the next century: Was it a foreign baked pie? Did the thrower have ties to Cuba? Many questions would remain, even after numerous probes and investigations took place.

In Israel, religious factions would blame secular Jews, secular Jews would blame the religious, while some far right-wing group would debate whether the pie was kosher. Whether it was is irrelevant, of course. Fortunately it was a pie and not a gun or knife.

One can only hope and pray that we can leave such acts of madness behind us as we head into the new year.

Holocaust survivor discovers old hiding place

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Holocaust survivor went back to Germany last year and found the very barn where he had hidden from the SS in the village of Sayboldsdorf, not far from Munich.

When he was there, Henry Neugebauer of Thornhill also met a German, Lambert Grassman, who is the director of a museum at Vilsbiburg, a few kilometres away.

Grassman apologized for what the Nazis had done, and showed Neugebauer a memorial to the 275 Jews who were shot to death in a forest nearby during a death march of 1,600 Jews from Buchenwald in April 1945, when the Americans were catching up with the German army.

Robin Neugebauer at memorial with Lambert Grassman.

Grassman was only eight at the time, but said he remembers the death march because they went right by his house.

Neugebauer, a survivor of that death march, did not know a memorial had been erected.

Born in Zarki, Poland, near Sosnoweic, Neugebauer was 13 when the Nazis sent his mother to Auschwitz and his two sisters to labour camps. He never saw them again.

Thinking about the death march brings back terrible memories to him, he said. He had been reunited with his older brother Michel at Buchenwald, and Michel was killed by the Nazis on that march, when he could not walk any further. He was thrown onto a wagon that followed the marchers.

> 'The SS men took the wagons into the forest and shot men and women'

"Every day, the SS took the wagons into a forest and shot the men and women who were pleading for water," Neugebauer said.

They were forced to march 36 hours with only a rest of half an hour from time to time, Neugebauer said.

On the side roads where the Germans took them, they would occasionally get a few potatoes from a farmer. "Some were eating grass they were so hungry. We had a utensil, a spoon that could be bent in such a way as to use it for a knife. Some of the marchers tried to cut meat from dead horses we passed."

At one point, Neugebauer, suffering from stomach cramps, asked two officers if he could relieve himself. Their response was to club him unconscious, and a friend had to rouse him the next day. For the next two days, the Thornhill man was blinded, and still suffers from blurred vision today.

He said he had to go into hiding because he could not walk any further, and he knew the fate that awaited him if was thrown onto the wagon as his brother had been.

"I crept into this barn, and when the SS came close to me, I dislodged a couple of boards and got into another barn."

Though one of the barns has been torn down in the intervening years, during his visit, Neugebauer was able to discover the place where he had hidden.

"I don't know how I managed to survive," he said. "I was just plain lucky…The SS knew, from a count, that I was missing. But they said they could not wait any longer, and went off without me. I learned later that they killed the 275 in a forest near Eich, about 12 kilometres from where I was hiding."

Neugebauer and Grassman continue to correspond, and this year, Neugebauer's daughter, Robin, visited the memorial and also talked to Grassman.

The colors of paradise

צבע גן העדן הוא שמו של סרט איראני מדהים שראיתי לפני מספר שבועות. הסרט מספר את סיפורו של ילד עיוור כבן שתים עשרה. ממש לא בא לי לקלקל לכם את התוויה הנדירה הזאת ולכן לא אגלה לכם את עיקרי הסיפור. אבל מאחר ואני לא ממש יכול לעמוד בפיתוי, אספר לכם את סצינת הפתיחה: ילד עיוור מחכה על ספסל בפנימייה לעוורים לאביו שיבוא לקחת אותו הביתה לחופשת הקיץ. הוא שומע צפצוף של גוזל ציפור בדשא, ובעזרת הקול הוא מצליח למשש את דרכו, למצוא את הגוזל ולשים אותו בכיס חולצתו. ובעודך חושב שהוא עומד לקחת אותו הביתה, ממשש הילד את דרכו לגזע העץ שממנו נפל הגוזל, ובמאמץ אדיר הוא מצליח לטפס על העץ, למשש את הקן שבו ישבת האם המדאגת ולהחזיר את הגוזל לחיק אימו. הדימוי שיש לאיראן בעולם, של מדינה חומייניסטית אכזרית ובלתי אנושית מאוד מנוגד לאיראן שמצטיירת בסרט- אנשים חמים, מאוד אנושיים ורגישים. הסרט מצטיין ברגישות רבה למצב האנושי, והוא רומז איזה סבל בלתי אנושי עוברים מיליוני איראנים בידי כוהני הדת והחומייניסטים שלהם. כותב הסרט והבמאי שלו הוא מג'יד מג'ידי, שהיה מועמד לאוסקר עם סרטו הקודם" ילדי גן העדן".

Author helps others to document their life stories

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In creating life stories of Jews and non-Jews, Leslie Wyle found that some stories are so remarkable that they seem to be invented.

Wyle, 79, an author, editor and public relations consultant has combined her years of experience to assist individuals to prepare their memoirs.

"This," she says, "can be a most meaningful legacy that people can create for the generations to come.

"Each person's needs are different," says Wyle. "With some, it is difficult to actually get them to tell you their story – they find it difficult to talk – particularly Holocaust survivors. It is like opening a floodgate of memories."

Wyle has produced more than 30 life-story books. She says that many of her projects are initiated by children who want to know about their parents and grandparents.

She explains that there are several steps in compiling material for a memoir – pre-arranged taping sessions or obtaining an individual's recorded material, transcription onto a computer disk, preparation of a manuscript, and consulting with a client to check the material for accuracy.

"It has been a most gratifying experience meeting people," Wyle says, "and getting them to tell me their stories. It is true that truth can be stranger than fiction."

Author Lesley Wyle

Wyle was born in Vienna, Austria. As a teenager, she fled to England in 1938 when Germany annexed Austria. She completed her education studying English, French and German. During the war, she worked for the British Broadcasting Corporation monitoring and translating German radio transmissions.

Following the war, she joined the U.S. army of occupation as an allied civilian. She was sent to Munich, Germany, where she worked as a translator and participated in intelligence work connected with the American denazification program.

In 1948, Wyle came to Canada to join her brother, Josef Eisinger, a graduate of the University of Toronto and now a retired research professor of biochemistry, and she went on to become the publisher of a daily newspaper on the electrical industry.

In 1940, she married Paul Wyle, a mechanical engineer and when their daughter Debbie was born, she decided to be a stay-at-home mom.

Later, she returned to Canadian publishing as an editor.

Wyle works with Susan Lands and Dee Simpson at Lifestories Press which has published the life stories of many men and women from diverse backgrounds.

When asked if she has published her own memoirs, she quips, "I should, but I am so busy. Perhaps I will one day."

Multi-faith conference gathers campus religious professionals

By ZAC KAYE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The first world conference of university and college religious professionals brought more than 550 participants to Vancouver, B.C., in late June.

They came from Australia, New Zealand, the Pacific Islands, India, Africa, Europe, South and Central America and, of course, Canada and the United States.

These campus professionals came together to learn from each other, as well as to further the work of providing for a stronger spiritual and caring setting within the framework of the campus experience.

Through the plenary sessions, participants were able to explore common issues as well as engage in discussion about those areas that divided them.

This was the first time that such a gathering could be described as multi-faith, with many of the world's Christian denominations being represented, together with Jewish, Muslim, Hindu, Sikh, Buddhist, and Baha'i participation.

The Canadian host committee was led by the Vancouver-based, Canadian national Lutheran chaplain, Bill Wiegert.

Wiegert is something of a pioneer and a visionary, who five years ago persuaded, against some stiff opposition, the Canadian Campus Chaplains Association to become a multi-faith organization.

He was the prime mover in enabling the other faith groups represented on campus in Canada to take their place at the Canadian National Religious Professionals on Campus table.

In insisting that the Vancouver conference be multi-faith, Wiegert felt it would better reflect the diversity and changing character of religious life on campus in North America.

The conference's theme was a Phoenix Rising, with the aim of highlighting the role of religious professionals in addressing the thirst for spirituality, wisdom and teaching and learning.

With many opportunities to address the theme through different denominational perspectives, the dialogue centred on how modernity and change, pluralism and fundamentalism are part of a struggle being experienced in almost every faith community.

The organizers took great care to introduce the native spirit into the conference, given its location in British Columbia.

In one particularly beautiful moment at one of the plenary sessions, the Pacific Island campus professionals, together with their Maori colleagues from New Zealand, presented a specially woven rug, expressive of the growth of religion in the South Pacific, to the B.C. native people participants. It will hang in the First Nations House of Learning at UBC.

Despite many such special moments, the small number of Jewish and Muslim participants at the conference felt that many of the Christian participants continued to be circumspect about the multi-faith aspect of the gathering and, indeed, the presence of people of other faith communities.

The Jewish presence made itself especially felt through a creative explanatory Shabbat program, with all the trappings of the Friday night dinner, the songs, the explanations of the various rituals and a wonderful d'var Torah given by Rabbi Lewis Bogage, a Reform rabbi and now a chaplain at DePauw University in Indiana.

At the dinner, the over 500 conference participants were singing and laughing. The event was described by many participants in their evaluation comments as the best event of the conference.

From the opening moments of the conference there was a sense of being part of a special community. In welcoming the conference, the president of UBC spoke warmly of the work being carried out by religious professionals on campus.

Being welcomed does not mean that there are not problems of funding, of empowerment and engagement, of students not being attracted to their faith groups and for many, seeking and finding a greater welcome in the more fundamentalist groups.

How do we relate to the institution? How do we work with student services? How do we deal with apathy? How do we respond to issues of poverty and create, for example, social action initiatives?

These were some of the many common questions that as campus professionals we shared and sought solutions to. There was a tremendous sense of optimism within the gathering and a general willingness to learn from each other and discover what worked.

Jewish speaker, Judith Plaskow, gave a keynote address titled Cultivating a Critical Consciousness: Jewish Feminist Reflections on Wisdom and Spirituality in the University, posing questions as to the accepted norms of the role of women in religious life and the way that Judaism in particular is responding to such challenges.

The Muslim speaker, Sulayman Nyang, a professor of African studies based in Washington, D.C., spoke on religion and the university campus in the age of globalization. He focused on the challenges facing Muslim students on campus as they deal with both the lures of modernity and the respect for conservative ideas.

Nyang described the tensions that exist for Muslim students as they seek to integrate their own religious practices, such as the need for prayer spaces, with that of the pluralistic campus community.

Their biggest struggle, he added, was trying to engage the university in providing prayer spaces and hallal food in the campus cafeterias.

Muslim students often find themselves co-operating with Hillel over these issues in the United States, he said.

Nyang did not minimize the pressures being brought by many conservative Muslim figures on campus to persuade Muslim students that the conservative, fundamentalist approach is the right way, as might be expressed in their attitude towards Jews and maintaining their hostility towards Israel on campus.

The conference participants were challenged by Senator Douglas Roche of the Canadian Senate, in his opening address to the conference, to create just such an open and welcoming environment. It seems that for many of the participants, this is exactly what took place.

It was important for us as Jewish campus professionals to know that there are colleagues of different faiths who seek to remove ignorance from this world and want to work together in creating a genuine pluralistic and open society, beginning within the extremely important arena of the college campus.

Zac Kaye is the executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

UJA Campaign 2001 sets goal of $45 million

At his first commercial audition in New York, Winkler faced competition from actors who were "about nine feet tall ... and every one of them was named Chad," he recalled.

But it was the actor named Henry who got the job, as he did after his audition for Happy Days in 1973.

It was an uphill battle, not only because of undiagnosed dyslexia and a childhood self-image "down around my ankles," but also because his parents, who fled Nazi Germany in 1939, wanted him to follow his father in the family lumber business.

When "El Shleppo here" was accepted to Yale School of Drama, and later, when Happy Days was about to begin filming and he had to cancel plans to meet his parents in Europe, Winkler broke the news to his mother on the phone.

"This is very nice... Tell your father," he said, recreating her reaction in a frosty tone, with a German accent.

Winkler spoke more warmly of his late parents as he related the story of their flight from Europe. His father, Harry, encased his family's heirloom jewelry in melted chocolate, so he would appear to be leaving on a business trip with nothing more valuable than a box of sweets.

The actor's father later pawned some of that jewelry to start his business anew in New York. Winkler received his great-grandfather's watch for his bar mitzvah, and in 1994 passed it on to his son Max on his own bar mitzvah.

Happy Days in '73

He also told of his Tante Anna, an aunt who was smuggled out of Germany in a coffin, a spider plant at her feet. He grew up with cuttings of the plant growing in his apartment, and started his own cuttings after his 1978 marriage.

"That spider plant said more to us for half a century than any words could," he said. "It was a symbol of survival, of determination... an expression of the life of Judaism itself."

His talk took a lighter turn when he spoke of his children, and he couldn't repress a grin telling stories of Max, now 17, keeping the hair gel industry solvent, and Zoe, 20, trying to wangle her way out of feeding her bunny when she was younger.

"They call me Mr. Strictie," he said.

"I think being a parent is absolutely the most difficult job on the face of the planet," Winkler added. "You have to be a bodyguard, a teacher, a student, a chef, a disciplinarian, a storyteller, a chauffeur, a psychologist, Darth Vader, adept at Double Dragon Two – and a bank."

Winkler said he is amazed by the disrespect shown to children in the United States. Not enough is spent on health care, prenatal care or day care, he said, "yet we're so willing to build new prisons and kill that child when they are 30."

The current need for immediate gratification outweighs long-term benefits and translates into violent behaviour, destroying not only children but their communities, he said.

"As Jews we have to be a light in the world, an example of tolerance, caring and mutual respect, especially when it is difficult," he said.

"It is as easy to be positive as it is to be negative," he insisted. "We have to be positive, with a sense of humour and a sense of continuum. What I love the most about us as landsmen is our tenacity. For 5,000 years they have tried to eradicate us, and we're still here making unbelievable contributions to the world. It makes me so proud."

Winkler was preceded on stage by Shlomo Gronich and the Sheba Choir (CJN, Aug. 24), an Ethiopian Israeli youth choir. Among their selections was a new song written as part of an arts festival that paired prominent Israelis with local artists. Shimon Peres chose Gronich and the choir, Gronich explained, to express his dream of peace.

Other speakers included Israel's Consul General Meir Romem, Women's Campaign and Advocacy chair Dodi Weill, who introduced Winkler; and launch co-chairs Leigh and Jeffrey Wortsman (president and CEO of Danier Leather Inc.), who presented Winkler with a new black leather jacket.

Special needs kids a priority of CJA

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish children with Down's syndrome, autism, cerebral palsy and serious learning and behavioural problems have been overlooked by the community, says 2000 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) general chair Stephen Reitman.

"For too long, many of our parents have had to go it alone. We have a moral obligation to help these children. That is why I have made it a focus of this campaign," Reitman told the more than 1,000 people at the kick-off held in the Medley, a cavernous night spot on St. Denis Street.

Campaign kick-off

Under the Directed Plus Giving program, CJA donors can specify they want part of their donation to go towards supporting children with special needs, if they give more than the previous year.

With more funding, Reitman said FEDERATION CJA will make more resources available to Jewish day schools to work with special needs kids, as well as for such programs as early-intervention therapy, socialization opportunities and home adaptation.

Reitman announced that psychologist Maxine Sigman, a past federation president, will head a task force to plan how to meet, what he termed, "the daunting challenge" of ensuring that the community better serves such persons.

"Millions of dollars will be needed...It may be a long journey." Some progress is already being made. This fall, 10 intellectually-disabled children aged 6 to 10 will begin attending United Talmud Torah elementary school under the first project of its kind in the Montreal Jewish community.

Summit School, a special education school, will run the program, which is supported by the federation and its agency, the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre.

Parents had petitioned the community to find ways to integrate their special needs children into the Jewish day school system.

Key funding for this program came from the 1999 CJA's Directed Plus, through the category of promoting Jewish education and identity.

The federation has also hired a special needs consultant to train day special education school teachers.

Over the long term, the federation will strive to develop a "centralized, coordinated response" to support those with special needs over their life time. In addition to direct services, the federation will also seek to make the Jewish community "more inclusive and sensitive" to members with disabilities.

Sylvie Amar, mother of a four-year-old boy with pervasive developmental delay (PDD), a mild form of autism, spoke candidly about the frustrations and sense of loneliness of raising a disabled child. What could help is having a place to go to get answers.

She was especially upset when a Jewish day care asked that Jonathan, then 2, leave after one month. Amar found health care professionals unhelpful and other services in Montreal to be scattered and scarce.

"It's necessary for children with PDD to get early intensive therapy at 2 years old, but no one informed me of this then...My son is now getting one hour of occupational therapy a week and I do his speech therapy myself and he is making progress. But how much more could my son have achieved if he had had intensive therapy early?" Amar asks.

Today, Jonathan is able to attend a YM-YWHA nursery with the presence of a "shadow."

The other areas for Directed Plus Giving are assistance locally to the poor, the elderly, Jewish education, youth retention projects, and the Sephardi community, and, in the former Soviet Union, to alleviate poverty among Jews or support their resettlement in Israel.

In 1999, over 2,100 donors chose to direct a total of $1.3 million to one of the specified areas. More than 20 new programs or services were started as a result. The intention of Directed Plus is to give people some say in how the money they give is spent.

Reitman said he is confident the 2000 campaign will surpass its goal of a record $37 million. Last year's CJA raised $35.7 million.

The One Million Dollar Reitman Challenge Fund has been created under which the chair, his family, friends and business associates have agreed to match each dollar of increased gifts by donors, up to a total of $1 million.

Winnipeg gets first Aish HaTorah branch

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Aish HaTorah has come to Winnipeg, marking the first Canadian branch of the Jewish outreach movement outside of Toronto.

Rabbi Shimon Lesserson, a New York native who has spent the last nine years studying at Aish HaTorah in Jerusalem, will head the branch.

Rabbi Lesserson says he was drawn to Winnipeg by the opportunity to share with a community the benefits he has accrued from becoming connected with Jewish tradition and the Jewish people. "At Aish Hatorah, we felt that we could make a contribution to the community here," he says.

Aish HaTorah was founded about 30 years ago by Rabbi Noah Weinberg who had previously started Ohr Somayach. The movement now has 25 branches worldwide and draws over 100,000 students a year, as well as another 400,000 visitors to its Web site.

Its mission, Rabbi Lesserson says, is to fight assimilation through Jewish education.

Initially, Lesserson is working out of the Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg and teaches part time at the Herzlia-based elementary school. He envisages running programs throughout the city.

"I will be doing some programs before yom tov," he says, "and teaching some classes during the High Holy Days. I am planning my major programs for after yom tov."

He is expecting to be joined by a second Aish HaTorah rabbi by the end of the year.

High school plan praised

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Quebec education ministry has shown a "favourable inclination" towards the opening of a Solomon Schechter high school, says principal Shimshon Hamerman.

"It looks like the government is interested in our project. The ministry wants to see the impact a new high school will have on other schools and will make a decision in the course of this year… on whether it will issue a permit," Hamerman said.

Solomon Schechter, the largest Montreal Jewish elementary day school, has plans to expand to the secondary level by September 2002, Hamerman said.

The impact of another Jewish high school is a concern for existing schools and communal authorities, Hamerman acknowledges, and Solomon Shechter finds itself having to defend its project to both government and FEDERATION CJA.

"We are in discussions with the community. We want to do what is communally responsible," Hamerman said.

Hamerman added the main reason Solomon Schechter wants to open a high school is to keep more students in the Jewish day school system. Currently, about 35 percent of Solomon Schechter's graduates do not go on to a Jewish high school, he said. Most of the graduates go to other private schools.

A survey conducted among a sampling of parents of these graduates indicates that, if there had been a Solomon Schechter high school, many would have sent their children to it, Hamerman said. There is also demand among the parents of the school's current students, he added.

Enrolment in pre-kindergarten through Grade 6 stands this year at 777 students.

The largest number of graduates continue at Bialik High School.

Solomon Schechter, which is associated with the Conservative movement and has its main campus next-door to Congregation Shaare Zion, has become an increasingly popular school over the years.

Hamerman recognizes that it's quite possible a Solomon Schechter high school would not only attract Jewish elementary day school graduates, but other students as well.

Schools that may be affected by the the move include Bialik High School, the Herzliahs in Snowdon and St. Laurent, and possibly Hebrew Academy.

Hamerman argues that Solomon Schechter's first responsibility is to its students and the community's primary concern should be that more Jewish children continue in the Jewish system.

"The number 1 concern of the community should be continuity. To say we should deprive our students because it would have an impact on other schools is an illogical conclusion," Hamerman said.

Solomon Schechter high school would probably be phased in one or two grades at a time, he said. Initially, quarters would be rented to house it. Hamerman attributes Solomon Schechter's growth to its ability to provide a Jewish education that is both traditional and liberal, and has a strong secular curriculum.

He envisages a more "intellectually oriented" school at the secondary level, "one that makes Judaism relevant" to modern, mostly secular youth.

A common wish among many parents is for less Hebrew or Jewish studies, he said, so that more time could be spent on science or sports or the arts, for example. Hamerman said non-Jewish private schools hold a "mystique" for many parents.

"It shouldn't be that way. Our students are accepted at the finest universities."

Hamerman admits that the positive results on the survey may not translate into high enrolment in a new high school.

No 'Jewish agenda'

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

This week I continue the discussion regarding the spuriousness of the suggestion that there may be an identifiable "Jewish agenda" to which Jewish members of Parliament are loyal.

Irwin Cotler is a perfect study of the pressures that tear at an MP who is, at the same time, an active Jewish community leader. Appointed by Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to promote ratification of the International Criminal Court treaty, Cotler's mission has taken him around the world, including to Israel.

When it came time to peddle the treaty to Israel, Cotler was unable to meet Israeli Justice Minister Yossi Beilin at the Ministry of Justice office because it is located in eastern Jerusalem. Beilin met him elsewhere. At a recent meeting in Toronto, Beilin spoke of the anomaly that a good friend could not meet with him in his own office.

Irwin Cotler is an eclectic fellow. He can be the most progressive liberal on some human rights issues but also the most hawkish on issues that challenge the essence of his principles. One of those principles is the inviolability of the security and legitimacy of the Jewish state.

It is safe to assume that for Cotler, Jerusalem is the capital of Israel and should never be redivided. If that is the case, how could he abide by the restrictions of those "striped pants" at Foreign Affairs Canada, prohibiting officials from meeting Israelis in "occupied territory, including east Jerusalem"?

Something has to explain why Cotler was guided by the government's policy, given that he would have known how offensive it is within the Jewish community.

Perhaps he reasoned: "I can stand on principle and disqualify myself from participating in the process. Or, I can accept that not everything can go my way and continue to seek ways to constructively influence the decision-making process." Remember, this is the same MP who attempted to get important changes made to the International Criminal Court legislation treaty. He did not achieve all he wanted, yet he chose to accept the results and hope for new opportunities in the future to improve the legislation.

It is reasonable to conclude that Cotler is in this for the long haul – or at least as long as he believes he has a contribution to make serving the best interests of the Canadian people, which of course includes the common interests of the Jewish people. It is on this basis that he and other Jewish MPs will be judged.

In support of Stockwell Day

By MICHAEL TAUBE
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day is a decent, intelligent, hard-working individual. These are personal qualities that usually command respect and admiration.

However, Day has been a target for left-wing political commentators to pick apart. He is a religious Christian, both pro-life and pro-family. He believes in lower taxes, less government intrusion, and more citizen responsibility.

Day has also been unfairly accused of holding anti-Semitic beliefs. During the July 5 televised debate for the Alliance leadership race, Jonathan Horler, a volunteer in Tory leader Joe Clark's office, posed the following question to Day: "I'd like you to answer, in one word, if you ever taught at a school, or if you ever said, that Jews were children of the devil."

Day promptly replied that this allegation was "absolutely, categorically, 1,000 percent false."

A prominent Canadian conservative politician with strong religious beliefs has once again been labelled as an intolerant individual. And the critics are off the mark.

There has never been a confirmed report of Day's uttering an anti-Semitic comment. There were Jews that both worked on his leadership campaign and voted for him. And there were Jewish supporters of his leadership bid, including myself.

Day has always had a number of Jewish friends and contacts. Claire Hoy noted in his book, Stockwell Day: His Life and Politics, that one of Day's childhood friends was David Berger, Canada's ambassador to Israel. When Ezra Levant and Day's oldest son, Logan, went to Israel two years ago, Day called up Berger to ask if he could keep an eye on them.

Day has been unfairly accused of stating that Jews are the children of the devil to students at Alberta's Bentley Christian Training Centre nearly two decades ago. This allegation came courtesy of former Alberta Tory senator Ron Ghitter, who was making critical comments about what he saw as anti-Semitic teachings in certain Christian schools.

However, Ghitter never directly blamed Day or his school during this one-man crusade. As he noted this April to Gordon Laird in the left-wing newspaper NOW, "I would never make that allegation against Stockwell." But Ghitter went on to say that he felt that anti-Semitism was "in the roots of Social Credit – and it is in today's Alliance, though not necessarily in the leaders."

Day has spoken out against this accusation on a few occasions. In 1985, he was quoted as saying, "We refer to Jews as the chosen people. The materials are against anti-Semitism."

Day is the most pro-Jewish political candidate since Brian Mulroney's time. As noted by National Post columnist David Frum, of "the five federal party leaders, it is Day who most effectively champions Jewish values and Jewish interests."

Day supports the need for school vouchers, an issue supported by many American Jews, from Milton Friedman to Joseph Lieberman. He supports religious freedom in synagogues, churches and mosques. He believes in the entrepreneurial spirit for large and small-scale businesses. And, like many other religious Christians, he is a strong supporter of the State of Israel.

In a democratic society, people are going to hold different points of view on various issues. As we move to an American-style political environment of dirty tricks and finger pointing, accusations of racism and religious intolerance will become more commonplace.

But one hopes that Canadians will still believe in a small principle called truth, and a little item called proof. For in the case of Stockwell Day, the truth is that there is absolutely no proof of anti-Semitism.

Winnipeg's leading tattoo artist embraces Judaism

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With his colourful tattoos and forthright manner, Strider Hotzon, Winnipeg's leading practitioner of tattoo art and body piercing, presents a striking figure when he saunters into synagogue.

Hotzon officially converted to Judaism last spring. He says that he is probably one of the most unusual Jewish converts that Winnipeg has ever seen. Although his wife, Shadow, is Jewish by birth, he avers that his decision to convert was for his own "selfish" reasons.

"I did it for me," he says. "We had been married five years before I considered conversion."

Born into a Catholic family in Buffalo, N.Y., Hotzon never took to the Catholic faith. "It didn't feel right," he says of Catholicism.

"I have been talking with God all my life, but in a non-denominational way."

At 13, he left home for good and spent years drifting from place to place living on the streets. He passed through Winnipeg several times before deciding to settle here.

Hotzon has been doing tattoos, an art he learned on the street, for 22 years.

"A fellow tattoo artist and I were responsible for getting the city to change its by-laws and allow tattoo salons to operate openly," he says. "I have the biggest selection of tattoo options in this part of the country. I have always refused to do any anti-Semitic or satanic tattoos."

Before meeting his wife in his tattoo studio ten years ago, Hotzon found Judaism to be interesting and fascinating and studied the religion.

He has a lot of praise for Rabbi Alan Green and Cantor Arky Berkal of the Beth Israel Synagogue (Rabbi Green left the Beth Israel at the end of August for the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in south Winnipeg) who guided him through his conversion classes and conversion.

"I really can't say enough about them," he says. "I had a thousand questions and they always found the time to answer them.

"The people at the Beth Israel Synagogue blew my mind," he adds. "I wasn't sure how I would be received, but I have been accepted unconditionally by my fellow synagogue members. They have made me feel like one of the family. I have had my share of aliyahs. I have been called up to raise and to dress the Torah. When I am not there for a Shabbat, people miss me. The Beth Israel has been magnificent."

Hotzon notes he encountered a few of his customers in the conversion classes and a few more at shul.

Hotzon has thrown himself into Judaism with eager enthusiasm. He has a mezuzah on his shop door and a Star of David on his chest. He dons tfillin every morning and spends an hour to 90 minutes every morning studying Torah and Tanach. Every Monday morning, he goes to the mikvah at the Asper Jewish Community Campus and of course, he rarely misses a Shabbat service.

"I'm a traditional fellow," he says. "I like the traditions. At home, we observe the festivals and holidays."

Planning ahead, he has bought tallitot, siddurs and Tanachs for his sons, aged four and five, for when they are older.

"I am adamant that when they are older, they will follow the Jewish religion," he says. "I hope that they will see their father as their role model."

Winnipeg grandmother jumps for charity

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ruthy Gale and Joel Dudeck jumped for charity.

From an altitude of 3,000 feet, the first cousins by marriage both jumped out of an airplane over Gimli's airport on Aug. 7 at 11:00 o'clock in the morning.

They jumped to raise money for the Village Clinic, where Gale has been a long time volunteer. The clinic helps out HIV patients in financial need.

Dudeck has jumped once before – 14 years ago to celebrate his 40th birthday.

"It's not something you do every day," he says. "It was for a good cause though so Ruthy and I agreed to do it together."

Dudeck describes the experience as both exhilarating and frightening.

Despite practising on a simulator until they could almost do it by rote, he notes, it was still a little frightening stepping out into the air 3,000 feet above the earth.

"We all have to die some time," he says, "but not every one chooses to really live."

Ruthy Gale is an individual who chooses to really live. Dudeck describes the mother of four (her Toronto-based son, David, is one of the creators and the host of a new 13-part cooking show called Loving Spoonfuls) and grandmother of six as a "terrific lady and role model."

Skyjumping is something Gale says she has wanted to do for a long time. In years past, she has embarked on such challenging outdoor experiences as trophy fishing, rock climbing, whitewater rafting and canoeing and camping in the wilds of northwestern Ontario.

Ruthy Gale and Joel Dudeck.

To prepare for the jump, she and Dudeck spent an evening at the Winnipeg Skydiving Centre's school in Gimli, a resort community about 100 km north of Winnipeg on the southwestern shore of Lake Winnipeg. They also spent some hours on the simulator the morning of the jump. In an e-mail to family members afterward, she described the experience.

"It was a fantastic and most unusual feeling to fly down in absolute silence," she wrote. "Chutes fly at 15 mph so you can either let it fly you down or you can enjoy the scenery as you fly it down.

"Since this was my first jump, the instructor encouraged me to make two left turns so that I could take in the whole 360 degree view ... a couple of times. I saw Lake Winnipeg to the east. From 3000 feet, the lake is a vast sea. There were fields in all directions; groups of cows looked like tiny toys; the highways were narrow ribbons and the people were so small that I really couldn't see them until I had flown a bit lower.

"The one thing that no amount of practice could prepare us for was the actual feeling of the wind as we stepped out of the plane and onto the step. You are trying to get your foot onto a pretty narrow piece of metal while the wind is whipping your leg backward. It feels the same with your hands when moving out to grab the strut. That was probably the most difficult time but I figured that the worst thing that could happen would be that I would fall.

"Since I had a parachute securely attached to my body and my intention was to fly it down, I wasn't worried."

Gale says she might skydive again if she feels like it. She would also still like to try ocean kayaking.

"There are still places to go and things to do," she says.

Deciphering Rabbi Ovadia Yosef's words on the Holocaust

By RABBI
J. IMMANUEL SCHOCHET
Special to The CJN

Feature

There is hardly a more sensitive subject than the Holocaust. Whatever is said of it arouses strong reactions. We saw this once more with the recent brief reference to it by former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, Ovadia Yosef, in the course of a lengthy discourse.

Rabbi Yosef, universally recognized as one of the great rabbinic scholars of our time, suggested that the six million martyrs were murdered because they were reincarnations of sinners. His words created a worldwide furore, extensively covered by both the Jewish and general media.

A torrent of condemnations descended upon the rabbi's head, albeit mostly from secular and anti-religious circles. Very few criticisms were reasonable and to the point.

When Rabbi Yosef said the next day that all martyrs are holy people, the critics reacted again. They claimed the victory of a retraction. In fact, the rabbi merely stated an explicit Halachah: Any Jew killed because of his religion, though he may have been the worst sinner, is holy and is vouchsafed a share in the world to come. The new status, therefore, does not deny earlier conditions.

Some mocked Rabbi Yosef's reference to reincarnation. They dismissed it as a non-Jewish, superstitious belief. To be sure, a few Jewish medieval philosophers, especially those of the Aristotelian school, rejected the concept of reincarnation. Maimonides makes no reference to it at all. Nonetheless, it has become a generally accepted doctrine in Jewish theology.

Rabbi J. Immanuel Schochet

Early references to it appear in the ancient Sefer Habahir, also known as the midrash of R. Nechunya ben Hakanah, tracing it to the Bible itself. The Zohar is replete with detailed expositions of this doctrine, explaining its reasons and workings. Practically all medieval authorities, who were also kabbalists, accept and use it to resolve many theological problems. It appears even in halachic works, such as the responsa and commentaries of R. Yechezkel Landau (known as Noda Biyehudah).

Rabbi Yosef's premise of sinners suffering, and thereby atoning for their misdeeds, in later incarnations, appears explicitly in Sefer Habahir (par. 195) and the Zohar (especially vol. 11:91b). Thus he reiterates a sound principle. Even so, I would apply to Rabbi Yosef the talmudic expression that "an error proceeded from the ruler."

Rabbi Yosef, like all religious people, is troubled by the dilemma of theodicy, the justification of God in the face of apparent injustice. The simplest solution has always been to invoke the biblical principle of retribution: good is rewarded and evil is punished. Thus it is quite easy to blame all suffering on known or unknown sins.

The problem, though, is that this unqualified approach is untenable. The biblical prophets, including Moses, questioned God as to why we see "the righteous suffer and the wicked prosper." The answer was not disclosed to them. Indeed, the Book of Job, devoted to this subject, rejects the simplistic answer.

A much more reasonable approach is to suspend human judgment and to resign ourselves to self-admitted, albeit frustrating, ignorance. As God said to Moses, no mortal can grasp the Infinite; thus it is impossible to understand the inscrutable ways of Divine Providence. To quote Maimonides, the valuations that come into play in Divine justice are known to omniscient God alone.

The religious person has no doubts that the Almighty is just and righteous in all He does or allows to happen, though we do not necessarily understand how that is so. That is where faith comes in. This implies no less that humans cannot, and may not, automatically assume that all suffering is to be attributed to the principle of retribution, as punishment for sin! Indeed, the Kabbalah states clearly that reincarnation is not necessarily rooted in personal sin, thus allowing for the reincarnation of souls of even true tzaddikim.

Moreover, the Torah contains 365 biblical prohibitions. One of these is ona'at devarim, to wrong or hurt another by words. The Talmud defines this prohibition to include saying to someone who is suffering that his tragedy must be traced to his sins and is a well deserved punishment. One may do so with oneself, and indeed ought to engage in serious soul-searching when afflicted, but never with another.

To attribute, the Holocaust to sin, then, is to violate both the letter and the spirit of Jewish law and tradition. With all due respect, Rabbi Yosef (and others who have taken a similar approach) erred most grievously. No mortal can ever explain the Holocaust, nor should one dare any attempt to do so. God alone knows the reason, and only a true prophet to whom He will reveal the mystery of this most horrible event may ever pronounce on it.

Most of the reactions condemning Rabbi Yosef in the vilest terms were no less objectionable. One may safely assume that those critics lashed out against him for purely political reasons. They looked for ways to attack him because he is the spiritual leader of the Shas party, intensely disliked by them for jumping Prime Minister Ehud Barak's ship.

Rabbi Ovadia Yosef

Especially disturbing was the ludicrous accusation that Rabbi Yosef blamed the victims of the Holocaust and vindicated their murderers. This argument is so absurd that it exposes the would-be critics' intellectual dishonesty and outright maliciousness. For even on the dubious assumption that a victim may have deserved what happened to him, this can never excuse the acts of his attacker. The attacker has no way of knowing who deserves what, nor has he been prophetically appointed by God to be His deputy and executioner. He acts purely for his own perverted reasons. Thus he is a crude criminal, fully culpable for his deeds, both morally and legally.

Israel's harsh enslavement and suffering in Egypt vividly illustrates the above: The Egyptian exile had been preordained in the days of Abraham before the victims existed. Thus they suffered for no sins on their part. Moreover, the Egyptians were held fully accountable for afflicting Israel, and duly punished for it. The same is seen also in the later case of the "Ten Martyrs," which may indeed be regarded paradigmatic to the Holocaust.

Rabbi Yosef did indeed err. But, emotional reactions, not to mention crude and unwarranted vilification, were not a proper response, even with so painful a subject as the enigma of the Holocaust.

Voyage of discovery: The camera is a pill which in turn sends them to a device, no bigger than a walkman, strapped to the patient's body.

The capsule is moved through the gut by peristalsis, the same process the body uses to transport food. The capsule is excreted naturally and the following day the patient returns the recorder to the doctor where the data collected is transferred to a special computer work station equipped with the company's special software.

Given – which stands for Gastrointestinal Video Endoscopy – revealed their wonder capsule at a digestive disease convention in San Diego in May of this year. The doctors learned that now there was a diagnostic tool that would allow complete examination of the small intestine without pain or discomfort. Furthermore, the limitations of conventional endoscopy, which only allows for the first one-third of the bowel to be examined, no longer applied.

The company, which was established in 1998 in the northern Israeli town of Yokneam, has applied and received patents all over the world.

The concept is based on Israeli military missile technology. So far $6 million has been invested in the project which now looks like one of Israel's biggest medical success stories. Modern technology will enable the capsules to sell at about $300 (US) each; this compares with about $1,100 to $1,500 for each endoscopy examination. Each computer work station will sell at about $30,000.

Following the FDA approval, trials will begin with patients in New York and London. Prof. Blair Lewis of Mount Sinai School of Medicine in New York will serve as the principal investigator of the trial and Prof. Paul Swain of the Royal London Hospital will lead the London trials.

TAV loses court bid

MONTREAL — The Torah and Vocational Institute (TAV) has lost its court bid to force the Université du Québec à Montréal (UQÀM) to continue a program that provided chassidim with an opportunity to pursue a university degree in an environment in which they felt comfortable.

Quebec Superior Court Justice Jean-Jacques Croteau rejected TAV's request for a permanent injunction against UQAM, which last April cancelled the program that offered courses in computer science and administration. TAV argued that it signed an agreement with UQAM in April, 1999, that was valid for three years. Courses began in September, 1999.

Croteau ruled that TAV, a private non-profit educational institution, has not suffered irreparable damage and that UQAM has an autonomy which should not be breached by a court "unless there is evidence of bad faith or justice denied." At the time of the cancellation, UQAM agreed to continue giving courses to the close to 550 students already registered to allow them to finish their bachelor's degrees or certifications. But it will not accept any new admissions and its professors will no longer teach at the classes for the Orthodox, which are segregated by gender.

About 170 of the students are in the segregated classes, and TAV academic director Eli Meroz said it is highly unlikely they would continue to study in mixed classrooms.

In its motion, TAV claimed UQAM terminated the agreement "on the basis of pure discrimination and intolerance, without right and without any default on the part of TAV..."

The UQAM senate decided to pull out of the program after the professors' union complained that too many courses were taught in English and that the segregation of men and women was not in keeping with the university's mission.

Prospects for imminent peace look bleak

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — President Bill Clinton was scheduled to meet Prime Minister Ehud Barak and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat this week, but sources in Jerusalem have told Ha'aretz that no breakthrough is expected. "None of the channels explored indicate progress," the sources said.

The leaders were to convene in New York for the United Nations Millennium Summit. Before the summit, a consolidated effort was to be made to bridge the differences.

Barak was said to be pessimistic about the prospects for progress because of Arafat's recent comments. In all of his public addresses since Camp David, Arafat has insisted on full Palestinian sovereignty over East Jerusalem and the holy Christian and Muslim sites. Arafat does not accept the Israeli portrayal of the planned meetings as a crucial point; he is still trying to buy time.

The recent talks held by Israeli and Palestinian officials also seem to be heading nowhere. The Israeli side blames the PA for backing out of previous commitments they had made on security issues, while the Palestinians claim Israel has backed down from promises on Jerusalem and the refugees.

"Apparently each side attributes to the other, undertakings that the other never made," an Israeli source told Ha'aretz. Another source said: 'It is hard to talk of backtracking, because in the [Camp David] summit both parties shied away from explicit commitments, but it is obvious that neither is enthusiastic about moving ahead."

However, if an agreement is not reached, the consequences would be dire, Barak has warned.

'Consequences could be dire'

In a meeting with Labor Party activists in Tel Aviv recently, Barak said he was not certain that his government could prevent the apparently imminent failure of the talks, "but it is inconceivable for any government to stop short of doing whatever it can to prevent it." If an agreement is not reached, "at least the whole world will be on our side," he added.

"My government took on the toughest issues, no wonder we are being criticized...We could have joined with the Likud and gone for a completely different agenda ... but that would have meant dropping the prospect of a peace agreement."

In a meeting with U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross, who was briefing Barak on Clinton's meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Barak said, "I value Egypt's contribution, but we need to get an agreement with Arafat, not Egypt."

Israel would not consider the Egyptian offer to distinguish between "custodian" and "residual" sovereignty, giving the Palestinians custody of the Temple Mount and residual sovereignty over the Western Wall.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa suggested that a "special status" be defined for the entire Old City of Jerusalem, including the Temple Mount, to rule out the need for divided sovereignty.

Meanwhile, in Jerusalem, Mayor Ehud Olmert met recently with about 100 Jews from the Jewish and Muslim quarters, who asked him to organize resistance to the government's concessions on the Old City and the Temple Mount. Olmert said he was devoted to this cause and would not give up.

Olmert called for the ousting of Barak's government, "which has managed to turn the discussion of concessions in Jerusalem into something legitimate, fashionable and even high-brow."

Olmert declared he would not assist in establishing any new coalition government unless the coalition would undertake to retract Barak's current policy. However, "the damage that occurred on the Jerusalem issue in the last few weeks will be very hard to repair," he lamented.

Barak has breached his explicit promise to keep the city together, Olmert charged. "Barak gave this promise before the elections and again before Camp David. But now he is the first Israeli prime minister to negotiate dividing Jerusalem, not only the remote areas, but the heart and soul – the Old City and the Temple Mount."

Brig.-Gen. quits over failed IDF operation

Three soldiers killed by friendly fire

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Brig.-Gen. Shlomo Oren, 44, commander of the Judea and Samaria division of the IDF took responsibility for the recent failed operation at Assira Shimaliya, and requested to be relieved from his command.

IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz has not yet accepted the resignation nor responded to it.

The investigation into the operation, in which three soldiers were killed by friendly fire and a fourth injured, is ongoing. The results were expected to be made public this week.

"Oren made the moral and brave move, but the picture was also clear to him. Clearly, this was a failed operation. He, as a commander, takes responsibility for this," a senior military source said.

Mofaz participated in a debriefing of the operation with senior IDF officers. At the end of the meeting, Mofaz decided that there remained some questions and ordered the continuation of the investigation by the General Staff, headed by Maj.-Gen. Shai Avital.

According to defence sources, Mofaz is likely to accept Oren's resignation but may ask him to remain in his post until next month because of concerns over trouble in the territories.

Oren, speaking with brigade officers under his command, said "I was at the head of the operation. There were errors and some of them led to the deaths of the soldiers. As a result of my understanding of the responsibility of a commanding officer, I decided to resign. No one told me to step out. I took the decision as a result of long thought and soul searching."

Senior officers at Central Command told Ha'aretz yesterday that they hope that Oren will rescind his decision. According to them, "the impact may be very damaging if the commander of the division leaves at such a critical stage. Oren proved himself during the Nakba events. His replacement in such a complex post will require long-term preparation for which there may not be enough time."

The officers also added that "his leaving is not the right move. It is a problematic decision because it is important for the country that he remain at this sensitive post in the territories in the coming months, perhaps more important than the impact of his resignation in setting new norms of taking responsibility."

A diplomatic storm revolved around Oren during the Nakba events in May when the Palestinians accused him of threatening to bombard the headquarters of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. Oren denied the accusations and said that the comments were made in a much milder tone, following an incident in which Palestinians shot at Israeli soldiers in Ramallah.

Israeli Supreme Court rules on Falash Mura

CJN News Services

JERUSALEM — In a groundbreaking judgment, Israel's Supreme Court has affirmed the right of 26,000 Falash Mura to have their aliyah eligibility determined according to law.

The Falash Mura are viewed as Jews who converted to Christianity. They have thus met much opposition to their requests for immigration.

Montreal Liberal member of Parliament and human rights advocate Irwin Cotler, who has acted as counsel on behalf of the Falash Mura for many years, and who argued the case before the Supreme Court, called the judgment a "significant breakthrough" in resolving the status of the Falash Mura, still languishing in Ethiopian compounds and villages.

"The Supreme Court has ordered the Israeli government – specifically the ministry of the interior – to put the necessary mechanism in place in Ethiopia so as to process the aliyah applications of the Falash Mura with all deliberate speed," Cotler said in a statement.

The court also declared that it would "supervise" the process, and instructed the government to report back, within 90 days, on its compliance with the court's decision.

Cotler told the court that the "right to procedural due process" is tantamount to "the right to life itself."

He submitted evidence that 450 Falash Mura in the Ethiopian town of Gondar died between June, 1998 and November, 1999, about 85 percent of them children. Most of them were arguably eligible to immigrate to Israel either under the Law of Return or the Law of Entry.

"Both the halachic and legal interpretations support the aliyah of the Falash Mura under the Law of Return," Cotler stated. "In particular, the Falash Mura have undergone a 'return to Judaism'; have demonstrated their intent to live as Jews; and have had their Jewish ancestry and identification as Jews supported and sanctioned by their own religious leadership."

> 'The right to life itself'

Cotler told the court that many of the Falash Mura would also qualify for aliyah under the family reunification provisions of the Law of Entry, as 65 percent of them have a first-degree relative in Israel.

Last week, the daily newspaper Ha'aretz reported there has been a 600 percent increase in the number of Falash Mura from Gondar requesting to immigrate to Israel. The monthly average for the last two years has stood at around 100. In July, 700 applied to immigrate.

Interior Ministry sources say that the rise in the number of applications does not mean there has been a change in Israel's immigration policy toward the Falash Mura. They say that policy remains as was: the applicant must meet the requirements laid out under the right of return.

Sources in the Israeli embassy in Addis Ababa say that along with an increase in the number of would-be immigrants, there will be a rise in the number of Falash Mura turned down.

Following the Falash Mura's initial application to the Supreme Court, and Interior Minister Natan Sharansky's visit to Ethiopia four months ago, the application process was sped up. But bureaucratic red tape remains: applications cannot be filed in the capital city, increasing the tension among the tens of thousands waiting.

In addition, 600 Falash Mura who received interior ministry approval months ago are not being allowed to immigrate because the absorption ministry is not ready to receive them.

Cotler noted that an irony of the court victory was that the action was initiated against Sharansky, whom Cotler had represented during Sharansky's years in the Soviet gulag.

Cotler said he and others will be watching the government's compliance with the ruling. "We will not relent until the Falash Mura will be able to join their brothers and sisters in Israel."

Polish church asks for forgiveness for anti-Semitism

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — In a letter read aloud throughout Poland during Sunday Mass two weeks ago, leaders of the Polish Roman Catholic church asked for forgiveness for the church's toleration of anti-Semitism and for other religious discrimination by Polish Catholics.

The soul-searching, five-part letter was recently issued by Polish bishops as part of the Church's Millennium Holy Year agenda of self-examination, apology and penitence for past sins.

The letter is seen as going further than an apology issued by the Polish church in 1991, because it acknowledges that during the Shoah some Poles were guilty of indifference and of enmity toward Jews.

The letter, which calls anti-Semitism and "anti-Christian attitudes" sins and criticizes the behaviour of some Poles during the Holocaust, also admits that Catholic anti-Semitism still exists.

"We want to express the value of the presence of Judaism in Polish history and of the coexistence between Christians and Jews," Bishop Jozef Zyczynski of Lublin said in an interview with the Rome newspaper La Repubblica.

In admitting sins committed by Polish Catholics during the Holocaust, he said, "we wanted to recall that there was indifference regarding the fate of people who were suffering deeply. And we suffer because of that now. We don't want simply to identify historical motives, but to open the way and the possibility for new relations between Jews and Christians."

He said the church in Lublin was organizing follow-up events, including one in which Lublin's Catholic University will grant an honorary doctorate to Rome's chief rabbi, Elio Toaff.

The bishops' letter asks for "forgiveness for the attitude of those among us who have disdained persons of other denominations or have tolerated anti-Semitism."

It notes that the Holocaust, while carried out by the Germans, was mainly implemented on German-occupied Polish soil.

In the spirit of Holy Year penitence, it says, "we must realize that along with noble efforts by Poles to rescue many Jewish lives, there are also our sins from that period: indifference or enmity towards Jews.

"Everything must be done to rebuild and deepen Christian solidarity with the people of Israel so that never and nowhere can a similar tragedy happen again," it says.

It says that it is necessary to overcome all expressions of "anti-Jewishness, anti-Judaism (animosity stemming from wrong interpretations of Church teachings), and anti-Semitism (hatred based on nationalistic or racial motives) that existed and still exist among Christians."

But, it notes, "we expect that anti-Polonism will be fought with equal determination."

"This is an important new step by the Polish Church in the slow process of beginning to approach the reality of anti-Semitism," said Stanislaw Krajewski, a Polish Jewish leader who has long been active in Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

"This will make easier the attempts to face shameful events, like postwar pogroms and the killings of Jews by Poles during World War II," said Krajewski, who is the Warsaw consultant for the American Jewish Committee.

Nonetheless, Krajewski said that while the condemnation of anti-Semitism as a sin was "very clear," he felt it a "pity" that anti-Christian attitudes are labelled in the same way, "because the consequences of the two have been incomparable."

Jordanian PM blasts opponents of relations with Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jordanian Prime Minister Ali Abu al-Ragheb accused opponents of peace in his country of inflicting economic damage on Jordan.

In a meeting with the professional unions in Amman last week, al-Ragheb said that even though his government would not force anyone to work with Israelis, he reminded those who are opposed to normalization that "our duty is to defend our country's laws and sovereignty and to make sure that it is a safe place for investors."

The professional unions established a supra-committee to fight all forms of normalization of ties with Israel following the signing of the Israeli-Jordanian peace agreement in 1994. The panel was also charged with ensuring that the unions' members did not establish links with Israel.

In the last two years, Jordanians who have had business relations with Israel have been threatened. Official newspapers have even published the names of businessmen and Jordanians who have ties with Israel.

An Israeli citizen, Nasat Shabita, was arrested last year in Jordan for forging documents and was sentenced to a year's imprisonment. Throughout his trial, Shabita did not receive legal representation because members of the Jordanian bar association are prohibited from representing Israelis.

Al-Ragheb said that "the government will protect all those who establish ties with Israel since they are operating within the law." He told union members "to re-evaluate your stance on the issue," adding that he hoped that there would be "no confrontation between the government and the unions."

This seems to be the most decisive response by Jordanian authorities to the anti-normalization camp in recent years.

Scholar wins battle over Dead Sea Scrolls

By MOSHE REINFELD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Ben-Gurion University professor last week won his eight-year-long fight to receive recognition for deciphering sections of the Dead Sea Scrolls that were published in the United States without giving him credit.

In 1992, Prof. Elisha Qimron petitioned the Jerusalem District Court to stop the distribution of the book, A Facsimile Edition of the Dead Sea Scrolls, published in the United States. It contained excerpts from the Community Rule Scroll, which Qimron had deciphered but did not receive any credit for. He also sought compensation for infringement of copyright and infringement of the "moral right" that his name should appear. Judge Dalia Dorner, who today serves on the Supreme Court, found in Qimron's favour and ordered the defendants to pay NIS 100,000 in compensation.

The defendants, publisher Hershel Shanks and editors Dr. James Robinson and Dr. Robert Eisenman, appealed to the Supreme Court. The appeal took seven years, ending in victory for Qimron.

Justices Aharon Barak, Yaacov Turkel and Dorit Beinisch supported Dorner's ruling that Shanks, Eisenman and Robinson breached Qimron's copyright. They ordered all copies of the offending book to be turned over to Qimron, as well as the printing plates.

Israel & the Jewish World

The True Spirit of Zionism

By RABBI MICHAEL MELCHIOR

Analysis

Whether the Camp David peace negotiations will mark a new Palestinian-Israeli deadlock or a turning point that will eventually lead to permanent peace still remains to be seen. But whatever happens on the diplomatic front, Israel's internal strength – the other side of the same coin – will play an equally decisive role in determining the quality of her future.

And yet, according to some, there is grave cause for concern. Israeli society is going soft from the inside, according to Yoram Hazony, president of the Shalem Centre, a right-of-centre think-tank, and an advisor to Benyamin Netanyahu from the days before he became prime minister. Israel's very existence is threatened today, Hazony suggests, not by Syrian missiles or Islamic fundamentalism, but by Israeli professors and journalists who are undermining the patriotism of the Israeli public and weakening their faith in the Zionist cause.

Hazony's culprit is post-Zionism, a dogmatic stance that believes the time is ripe for a reassessment of the ideology that created the Jewish State and sustained its morale during the first half-century of its fight for survival. Belief in Zionism gave Israeli soldiers the courage to fight, and families the strength to send their children off to war.

But according to Hazony, a new and dangerous intellectual wave is sweeping the country. Historians who question the basic justice of the Zionist enterprise and are obsessed with debunking the national myths that give Israeli society its cohesion have succeeded in damaging Israel's image in the eyes of its own citizens and supporters.

Moreover, with the open collusion of the Ministry of Education, these professors have transformed the curriculum in Israeli schools. History was once a course of study designed to create a deep identification with the Zionist enterprise and the Jewish people, Hazony says. Today, a curriculum with a universalistic perspective aimed at distancing children from their nation and people has, insidiously, taken its place.

Hazony's alarming assessments have received a great deal of attention in the American media, especially within the American Jewish community. For those of us who care about Israel, I have some good news: the sky is definitely not falling. Hazony exaggerates the influence of the post-Zionist historians. Key portions of these historians' arguments have been effectively refuted, both in the academic world and in most of Israel's major newspapers, including the left-of-centre Ha'aretz. Meanwhile, the post-Zionist historians themselves have softened and revised some of their views in their more recent publications.

Some of the issues raised by the post-Zionist historians – Israel's role in creating the Palestinian refugee problem, or the mistreatment of Arab citizens of Israel during the 1950s – do contain more than a grain of truth, as Hazony himself admits. But Israel's willingness to engage in self-criticism is largely a sign of health, not of weakness. Israeli intellectuals can sometimes go overboard in self-flagellation, but the vast majority of Israel's citizens are savvy enough to know the difference between the overall justice of the Zionist cause and incidents of injustice and cruelty that sometimes accompanied our fight for survival.

Moreover, anyone who would take the time to check Israeli classrooms would quickly discover that there is no conspiracy being promulgated by the Israeli Ministry of Education to turn our children away from identification with the Jewish people and the Zionist cause. The Ministry of Education calls Hazony's accusations "a pack of lies," and while that may be overstating the case, Hazony, in order to bolster his alarmist argument, clearly took passages out of context and ignored vast amounts of material that our children do learn.

More importantly, I think Hazony misses what Zionism has been all about from the very beginning. Zionism is, first of all, a pragmatic movement that has compromised with reality over and over again in order to create the conditions in which the Jewish people can thrive. Our ability to accept and embrace reality is the reason that we have been able to spend the last 50 years building our state, while the Palestinians "who never missed an opportunity to miss an opportunity" for compromise have spent those same years in refugee camps or under military occupation. (I hope I'm proven wrong, but Yasser Arafat's behaviour at the recent Camp David summit may have been responsible for one more missed opportunity.)

To be a pragmatist, one has to read reality correctly, and I am convinced that an accurate reading of reality reveals something quite a bit different than Hazony's portrayal. The reason many Israelis have wearied of certain kinds of Zionist rhetoric is not that a few intellectuals have questioned events that happened 50 years ago. It is that this kind of rhetoric has often been used to sustain an untenable situation which Hazony and his allies on the right would like to extend indefinitely.

Most Israelis know that Zionism is about the Jewish people governing ourselves and creating our own future, and that ruling over three million Palestinians is just not part of that equation. When Zionism is distorted into the kind of nationalism that cannot read reality clearly, its message will inevitably begin to fall on deaf ears.

The same thing is true of Judaism. Over and over again, I have found secular Israelis, on the left no less than on the right, hungry for Jewish learning and eager to incorporate Judaism into their daily lives. That is, of course, if they are not being forced to do so by government legislation. The animosity towards religion expressed so vehemently by some Israelis is not aimed at Jewish tradition at all, but at the notion that only certain groups, backed by powerful politicians, have the right to define how Judaism should be practised by everybody.

I do agree with Hazony in one important way. The spirit of Zionism is desperately needed if Israel is to overcome the inner rifts and external enmities that threaten its well-being. But the Zionism that is needed is not a rigid and strident ideology. It is a Zionism with the strength and flexibility to respond to reality in a way that will enable us to renew ourselves as a united people, politically, spiritually and culturally. That is the kind of Zionism that got us on the map in the first place.

Rabbi Melchior is minister of Israeli society and the world Jewish community.

Israel's Phalcon won't fly in China

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Prime Minister Ehud Barak was recently called upon to settle a touchy problem relating to Israel's strategic relationship with the United States. Would he succumb to American pressure and scuttle the sale of the $250 million U.S. Phalcon airborne radar system to China?

Mideast Analysis

On July 12, a day into his Camp David talks with President Bill Clinton and Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat, Barak announced the cancellation of the Phalcon deal. In a letter to Chinese President Jiang Zemin, Barak expressed "sorrow" for his decision and voiced the hope that Israel's budding friendship with China would not be affected.

It remains to be seen what impact, if any, the cancellation will have on Israel's relations with China. But Israel is taking no chances. Last month, Israel offered China an experimental desert farm as compensation. The Phalcon fiasco, however, may yet erode Israel's credibility as a leading arms exporter.

Barak, in weighing the Phalcon sale, had to take several important factors into consideration. Since China had an option to buy seven additional Phalcons, the contract was potentially worth a whopping $2 billion, a tremendous boost for the Israeli arms industry in general and for Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI) in particular. On the other hand, how could Israel flout the U.S., its chief ally, and benefactor of military and economic aid valued at $2.8 billion annually?

Barak knew that the Clinton administration – the most pro-Israel in American history – was opposed to the sale, finalized by Benjamin Netanyahu and Yitzhak Mordechai in 1998. Indeed, the American ambassador in Tel Aviv had given Israel a note to that effect.

American objections were two-fold. The U.S. – the world's biggest arms exporter – was concerned that the Phalcon, mounted on a Russian-made cargo plane, would enhance China's military capabilities against Taiwan and thus harm U.S. interests in the Far East.

U.S. arms manufacturers had a say in the matter, too. Since 1989, American companies have been forbidden to sell radar to China. But these firms are anxious to sell their wares to countries other than China, and if the U.S. government can impose sales restrictions on Israel, American giants like Boeing and Bell will have an enormous competitive advantage over their Israeli counterparts. They were miffed, for example, when Israel won a tender for the sale of the Phalcon to Chile.

IAI, with 14,000 skilled workers on its payroll and a major force in the Israeli economy, urged Barak to honour the Phalcon deal. IAI was backed to the hilt by the ministry of defence, which feared that a cancellation would damage Israel's growing ties with China and have a chilling effect on future buyers of Israeli military equipment.

The foreign ministry, on the other hand, warned Barak that the Phalcon sale would jeopardize Israel's pivotal ties with the U.S. Five senior senators had informed Barak of its negative consequences, and an influential American congressman, Sonny Callahan, had threatened to withhold $250 million in assistance to Israel. In yet another ominous sign, several congressmen had sharply criticized Israel.

Even Ora Namir, Israel's former ambassador to China and a strong advocate of closer ties with Beijing, advised Barak to jettison the sale. She argued that Phalcon components might fall into the hands of Iran, a hostile country which buys Chinese military hardware.

For the record, the Phalcon affair was not an isolated incident.

In the 1980s, Washington forced the cancellation of the Lavi jet project and compelled Israel to cancel the sale of Kfir jets to Ecuador. Last year, the U.S. persuaded Poland, a recently-admitted member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, to pull the rug from under an Israeli upgrade of its fleet of combat helicopters.

And now, in the latest twist, the U.S. is pressuring Israel not to sell the Phalcon to India, an increasingly lucrative market for Israel.

The lesson is clear. A small client state like Israel cannot defy a superpower like the United States, especially when vital corporate interests are at stake.

Bold, bright colours will dominate the autumn palettes. Burgundy/plum is the forerunner with mineral tones a close second. Smoky shades of coal will paint the eyelids while metallic frosts highlight. Platinum shimmered lips will shine with mouth-drenching gloss. The season invites you to be totally luxe.

Begin serious cleansing regimes as the humidity from the summer months tends to clog pores. A facial is definitely in order – at home or by a professional. The colder temperatures and heating systems will make your skin feel dry. Start to apply more richly formulated moisture creams to keep your skin supple.

Keep up your diet and exercise routines. This is the time of the year that we generally let them go. Remember, winter holidays are around the corner, an extra five pounds is not something you want to take along. Take care of your body and it will take care of you. Your physical appearance is a direct reflection of the healthy choices you make.

CAROL'S TIPS

Skin Care: Lancome presents Vinefit, a delicious, energizing breakfast for your skin. Its incredible sensation of freshness will awaken your skin to a new and youthful appearance.

One touch is all it takes to believe the value of Idealist from Estee Lauder. This new state-of-the-art Lauder formula provides a state-of-perfection for your skin.

Line Eraser from L'Oreal is a pure retinol concentration that promises to minimize lines in four short weeks.

Cold Cream Cleanser from MAC is wonderful. It's rich and very luxurious. Also from MAC is a great new eye cream that is light in texture and is true to its name, Fast Response.

Operation Wrinkles 2000 from Dior brings us Phenomen - A Jour anti-wrinkle day cream and Phenomen - A Yeux delicate eye cream. Both contain an advanced retinol formula that will give your skin exceptional results.

Elizabeth Arden introduces three fabulous masks: Deep Cleansing for Oily Skin, Hydrating for Dry Skin and Clear the Way for Normal Skin – all fabulous!

Basic cleanser and toners are now available in 400 ml value sizes (uncartoned) at Arden counters. Specifically designed for time challenged men and women, Shiseido pampers our needs with 100 percent cotton Pureness Gentle Cleansing Sheets. A quick wipe and all impurities are gone and the best is – no rinsing required.

Also from Shiseido is a great new protective lip conditioner to help preserve the youthful appearance of your lips while protecting them with an SPF of 10. It's packaged in a convenient lipstick tube and made my lips feel ever so soft.

CHANEL

Foundation: Clinique's clarifying oil-control gel makeup is cooling, and gives a moderate coverage. The powdery-matte finish stays on for a proven eight hours without fading or shine.

Teint Fluide Universal is new from Chanel. It is satiny in texture and provides an even coverage. It contains a vitamin cocktail to protect and add brightness to your face. Teint Cristallin Stick, also new from Chanel, is a great traveller providing great coverage and perfect touch ups – don't miss their new matifying papers – instant refresh!

Try Lise Watier's Base Miracle, an amazing gel that will help minimize the appearance of enlarged pores. Also from the Watier collection is a five-way concealer designed to correct and conceal all skin irregularities. This magical compact is perfect for sleep deprived night owls.

For a gorgeous glow and bronzing effect take a look at Hyper Real Foundation from MAC. Line Smoothing Concealer from Clinique helps to smooth and conceal lines around the mouth and lip area.

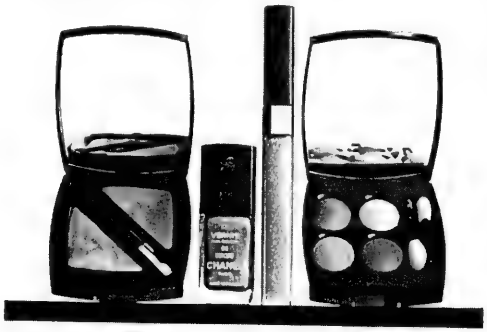
Sweet Cheeks: Chanel's star product this season is Platinum Face Powder. Add a silvery sheen to your cheekbones, shoulders, or dust some high on your cheekbones to attract the light.

Express Blush from Maybeline is a very portable stick that glides on easily and offers a long-lasting natural look.

Hilites from Faces is a sheer creamy colour that imparts a subtle glimmer to cheeks, eyes, lips and body. It is perfect for those nights out on the town.



CHANEL

Lancaster's Cheek Glow is a fabulous new cream blush. It's available in the colour nude, which perfectly compliments all skin tones.

L'Oreal's Ripe Collection reveals Translucide Gel Blush – a gorgeous radiant formula that gleams like the outdoors. Pink Cashmere Blush from Arden is simply exquisite.

Do take a look at Potion Magique from Lancomes' Instinct grouping. When applied, this reddish plum colour appears like the red has flowed back into your cheeks.

Eye Candy: L'Oreal treats us with Featherlash. This creamy mascara not only makes our lashes look lush, but conditions them with glycerin and vitamin E.

For intense eyes try Maybelines' Shadow Duo in Berry Chic or Green Glam. Chanel's Duo Spectral is a fascinating creation composed of a gentle cream eye shadow that brightens the eye and a lip-gloss that brightens the lips. This gorgeous compact is included in the "Platinum Kit".

To continue this diamond look, paint your nails with Mercure and top up your lips with Galaxie – this look is truly, radiance in motion.

If that isn't enough, Chanel spoils us this season with new mascara – Extreme Cils. It is a volumizing formula and will give you a perfectly controlled application.

Light up your eyes with Lancaster's Light Enhance Eye Shadow. It's available in four new shades. Take a look at the orange – it will stir the embers in your eyes and maybe...

Estee Lauder brings us Go Wink Liquid Eyeshadow in high-sheen metallic shades. The colour is long lasting and waterproof – perfect for the bridal day.

Dior brings us a five colour compact called chiffon petals that is feminine and another perfect traveller.

Kissable Lips: Tubes of deep mouth-drenching, cocoa-toned lipsticks from Clinique are ever so sumptuous. Check out their fuchsia nail polish called Hotsy Totsy.

Sparkle your lips with Lancasters' Gold lip gloss; wear it alone or top up your favourite shade.

Goddess on the Go from Quo includes three stacked containers featuring lip gloss, eye shadow and cream blush. You can mix and match, using each product on your eyes, lips or cheeks. Quo products are available at all Shoppers Drug Marts.

Compose brown, burgundy and sequined sheer gloss to create your own mystique with Lancome's beautiful intuition trio from their Instinct Collection.

Hair: Danielle, from Salon Daniel (79 Yorkville Ave.) tells us that structure is back, no more messy hair. This will compliment the huge comeback of the suit. Long bangs will also return along with finger waves from the 40s.

"However, the twist is that the waves will have straight ends and will be popular with short, medium or long hair," says the stylish designer.

Here, a team of advisers helps you find the item

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to The CJN

It can't be too easy for men who have never liked to shop and suddenly find themselves in the new climate of dressing down.

Once it was easy enough to get the perfectly cut suit, made to measure or off the rack, have the salesperson match a shirt and a tie and voilà, instant outfit. These days, it's an entirely new ball game. What goes with khaki? Do I wear a polo neck or a mock turtleneck? Will I look too casual?

But never fear, help is available. Le Club European Menswear, located at 424 Eglinton Ave. W., isn't just another shop. In its 1,300 hundred square feet, there's a team who will quietly suggest items and ensembles that fit in with lifestyle needs.

The team is made up of the two owners, husband and wife Marc and Nadia Saref, as well as staff members Lily and Rita. The latter have been trained by the Moroccan-born Nadia, a certified wardrobe consultant, and Nadia has made sure her assistants know about fabrics, maintenance, fit and styling. "People appreciate this real attention," Nadia says.

This chic mother of two has a definite focus on how to help the somewhat hesitant shopper, and she'll also make suggestions to those in the know.

"My staff has been trained by me, so it doesn't matter who serves the customer. The outcome is the same. Besides we don't have staff turnover. Continuity makes it better for the clients."

Le Club opened in 1982, but "I realized more and more that there was a need for professional advice," says Nadia. "The difference between this store and other menswear stores is our special service."

'Most men need a woman's touch'

As for competition with other stores, she says, "We're smaller and our overhead isn't as high. We're less expensive and give customer service. It's important to have consistency and we have that with our staff."

The shop is well thought out. There's a skylight in the back room and mirrors outside the entrance so the true colours can be seen. This caring attitude is extended to the merchandise.

For both the bar mitzvah boy and his father, there's a treasure trove of great looking items. On the racks are suits, jackets and youthful looking ties and shirts ("Burnt orange is cool," says Nadia), which can be worn either for the informality of today's dressing-down dictate or up a few notches to more formal attire.

"We had the demand from the parents for more formal wear for their sons," she says. "It's a time for change and choices. Could be that the young boy is being invited to bat and bar mitzvahs, and jeans aren't correct."

One of the outstanding suits for teens is a four-button grey stretch with slimmer pants.

On the other side of the shop, there are Italian imports and private label outfits for dad. A must this season is the knit black blazer. It's the new soft casual, yet still with enough pizzazz to take the computer nerd to the banker's and the corporate gang to their clubs.

Known for her co-ordination skills, Nadia shows her stuff by adding wool pants and a few shirts to achieve an array of different looks. First she tries the monochrome charcoal on charcoal and then introduces contrasting ties. These are combined with a soft yellow shirt and a burgundy shirt. Three ties, three shirts, three looks.

"When a man comes in, we don't say too much. We let him tell us what sort of clothes he needs. He may be conservative or casual. Anyway, I get my lead from him," Lily says.

"For the new casual, we find that accessories are major," Nadia adds. She takes a few leather belts from the hanger. All have interesting silver buckles, one matte, the others shiny. "A flat, simple belt won't do it. Everything is important, even glasses and shoes. This is modern."

"Most men need a woman's touch," Lily says, but when asked about men and women shopping together, she says there's 50-50 breakdown of men coming in alone and those who come with a wife or girlfriend.

"We have the knowledge, and the results are that customers return. The consumer appreciates that we give him so many options."

All the stock, even the Italian imports, are bought in Canada or at the top men's show in Las Vegas.

"For fall, there's still the three-button suit and we still have the four-button. The charcoals are still in – lots of charcoal superimposed with black and medium grey. There are grey flannels and I introduced salt and pepper in the sweaters. Ties are almost four inches wide. Monochromes are still very important as are interesting patterns," Nadia says.

Dealing with those darned socks!

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

Forget that children's socks, tights and stockings are usually found rolled up under beds, in the corners of bedrooms, and in mildewy piles on the bathroom floor. They still need them for warmth and comfort, and for school and after-school, and you still have to buy them.

Maybe if the legwear is cool enough, they'll wear it and take care of it. Maybe.

Deciding what to buy this year begins with a trip to the dreaded sock drawers. Get rid of the unwearables – socks with holes, socks without partners, stained or beyond dirty socks stuffed back in there by kids who shall be nameless.

You can buy six-packs

Check through the nylon legwear too, and get rid of pantyhose with runs and tights that might be, well, too tight. If the socks have clearly been there for a while, have their owner try them on and show you they fit.

Now you can sock-hop – as long as you know what the kids need. Do they need ankle socks or knee socks for school and sports? What about pantyhose, tights and leggings for classes, playdates and parties?

Make a list, leave everyone at home, and head for the stores. Yes, you can go to a specialty sock boutique (for special-occasion legwear), but department and discount stores are good, too. There is also that camping-gear shop where you bought those socks that actually survived camp.

Socks are easiest to buy – they're unisex, and there are no difficult-to-find sizes. You can buy six-packs of ankle-length tube or sport socks (white's right for everyone), or get packs with reinforced soles or a variety of colours. You can also get packs of knee socks in tones that work for school and shul.

Before you go overboard, though, have everyone try on a pair with school shoes and good shoes.

"Too thick" socks get pushed to the back of the sock drawer. Get a few thin pairs for good wear and warmer weather.

This year's shades for ankle and knee socks include the standard neutrals (navy, black, grey and white, cream) along with blues, purples, muted greens and bright reds. Cotton and cotton mixes are standard (and wash best), but you might want some wool socks for winter wear and some really heavy ones for skiing and skating.

Stay away from nylon socks – unless they have a trendy design or lace trim that's perfect with a party dress.

For girls, there are durable, opaque tights in the same colours (and ballet-pink), and pantyhose in nylon and cotton-nylon blends in go-with-everything white or beige. If your school uniform code allows it, though, get leggings to wear under tunics and skirts; they're warmer than tights, and rarely run.

Try-ons are a must, too – the first day of school (or the first day of Rosh Hashanah) is no time to find out that the tights are too short in the leg, or that the pantyhose is hard to pull up.

If you want socks to make it back to the sock drawer, label them – with indelible ink on the soles if they're light-toned, or labels sewn into the cuffs if they're dark-toned. Label leggings and ballet tights at the waistband. Then relax – you've really socked it to them.

Fashion Tips for Contact Lens Wearers

Most fashionable women spend extra time applying makeup when they are getting dressed up for a formal party. Whether you are planning to do your own makeup or hire a professional makeup artist, anyone who wears contact lenses should take extra care with makeup selection and application, say the American and Canadian Optometric Association affiliates.

Tearing and irritation, while a minor annoyance, could lead to more serious problems during or after the wedding or formal function. When shopping for makeup, choose a water-based, hypoallergenic liquid foundation, instead of cream, to prevent leaving a film on your lenses. You should avoid lash-extending mascara, which has fibres that can irritate the eyes, and waterproof mascara, which cannot be removed easily with water and may stain soft contact lenses.

Avoid using hand creams or lotions before handling your contacts because they can leave a film on your lenses. Use an oil-free moisturizer. Keep false-eyelash cement, nail polish and remover, perfume and cologne away from lenses. These products can damage the lens plastic.

Hair spray should be used before putting in contacts. If used while they are in the eyes, close eyes during spraying and keep them closed for a few seconds afterward. Put in soft contact lenses before applying makeup. Rigid gas-permeable (RGP) lenses should go in after makeup is applied.

Finally, entrust someone with your contact lens case. Resist the urge to quickly moisten your lenses with saliva or bottled water should they become dry or uncomfortable. Both may contain bacteria that could lead to an infection.

Follow these tips, and your eyes will be as lovely as you are for that special occasion. For more information about contact lens selection and care surf the net at www.aoanet.org.

Know your kids' habits

By SHERYL HALPERN
Special to The CJN

In an ideal world, you'd order school uniforms at the end of the summer, they'd fit perfectly and your children would love wearing them. (Actually, in an ideal world, the school would send you all the uniforms you needed, neatly pressed and wrapped in tissue paper.)

However, in this world, you've just finished doing all that vacation and end-of-camp laundry, and you've got to shop. Do you go for one-stop shopping or bargain-hunt? Do you bring the kids along? (They won't want to come – that's guaranteed.) How much new clothing do you buy?

First, pick up the school's guidebook and read the rules on uniforms. What will your child be wearing, day to day? When do students have to start wearing uniforms – right away, or midway through September? Are there any "casual dress" days?

Find out where to buy the uniforms. What will your kids be putting on each day of a typical week? How many gym days are there? Is there a special uniform for certain extracurricular activities like choir? You can probably manage with two pairs of pants or tunics and one gym outfit, unless you have back-to-back gym days.

Know your kids' habits. Buy an extra skirt or pair of jogging pants if your children are dirt magnets or daredevils, so that when something comes home with a spectacular stain or rip, you won't have to look up the number of the uniform store or do a midnight wash.

Think about weather changes, too. You're probably buying quite a bit for late fall and winter, but what about Indian summer and that blistering-hot weather that comes, for some reason, in May and mid-June? Buy more than one pair of shorts, or you'll be spending a lot of time in the laundry room.

Talk to your kids and ask them what they want to wear? Find out if they prefer cardigans or pullovers, joggers or trousers, skirts or tunics, and, if there's a choice, the red or blue sweatshirts. If you don't, some clothes may spend most of the year in the closet – or get "lost" at school.

Does the school crest have to be on every item? If you don't have to buy tops with crests on them, you're in luck. Go to department or discount stores and get your turtlenecks, blouses or short-sleeved and long-sleeved shirts at lower prices.

About five or six long-sleeved tops and two or three short-sleeved ones per child should do it. Get good quality tops, but look for buy-in-bulk or two-for-one deals. Buy your socks and tights at sales, too. If you can, get them on special in packages.

Now that you've got your list, it's time to shop – and bring your kids (yes, you have to drag them along.) Don't trust the store's sizing. Make each child try on the pants or sweaters he or she will be wearing – and make sure each piece has "room to grow." If something is snug, go one size up – from a medium to a large, say. The larger size will probably fit perfectly, come February.

Now that you've struggled home with all those bags, the fun really begins because you have to label everything. (If you don't, all those outfits will spend time in the lost and found.) Make it easy on yourself and use indelible-ink markers – or iron-on nametapes.

In an ideal world, of course, everything would be labelled for you and children would never lose sweatshirts or joggers. Dream on – and have a good school year.

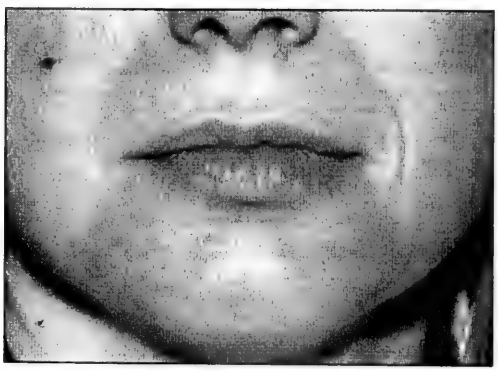
Say goodbye, without surgery, to facial lines

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Imagine being able to minimize the lines in your face in the time it takes to tie your runners. Does this sound like mythology to you? Well, it's now possible, and the best part is that there is no pain and no cutting.



Before treatment

A small, fine needle transmits a fine injectable substance into the lines and like magic they disappear.

These incredible injections can also enhance your lips. A downside, however, is that most don't last longer than four to six months.

Today, injectables have become so easily accessible that they are no longer just a cover girl choice. Women and men from all walks of life are visiting their doctors to request subtle and not-so subtle changes.

New techniques and fillers are being developed all over the world. The west and east coasts here are about the same, but internationally, it seems France is the leader with a substance known as polylactic acid.

I recently visited the Toronto office of Dr. Steven Mullholland (Spamedici). He showed me some before and after photos of people who had injectables done to minimize their lines and enhance their lips. I thought they were absolutely fabulous!

"Injectables are a great solution for women and men wanting their lips enhanced or lines minimized. However, they don't replace the traditional surgical procedures like face or brow lifts, and sometimes both procedures are implemented for optimum results," Mullholland says.

Collagen is one of the most popular injectables, but more natural substances are often used. Hylaform and Restylane are similar in that they are both gels being derived from hyaluronic acid, a humectant that keeps skin moist and supple, that occurs naturally in our body.

Dr. Francis Beninger says both these gels provide excellent results, are referred to as a "fill in" and last about four to six months.

There seems to be some controversy over the use of fat injections. The process involves removing fat from one part of the body and injecting it into another. Some surgeons say that you don't put fat where you've never had it; they claim it just doesn't work. Nonetheless, Mullholland, who studied this procedure in New York, says that if the process is carried out by a skilled surgeon, the micro-fat technique can be successful and will last as long as one year or more.

Polylactic acid injections are most popular in Paris. They last two to three years and are particularly good for older women who have bone loss or tooth recession. Polylactic acid is injected inside the mouth to project the lips forward. It is possible that this procedure might find its way to Toronto, but not likely in the near future, Mullholland says.

Artecoll is another injectable that lasts and has great results. Artecoll consists of homogeneous polymethylmethacrylate (PMMA) microspheres evenly suspended in a solution of partly denatured collagen. Following the injection, the body will degrade the collagen vehicle within one to three months. The microspheres will be totally encapsulated by a fine fibrous capsule and the process will be complete after two to four months.

Mullholland cautions, however, that it often takes two or three injections for complete results and that an allergy test is essential.

After treatment

The injectable Botox is another story. This substance is a botulinum toxin, which is a protein derived from bacteria, Beninger explains. It sounds awful, but the results are spectacular. He says it actually paralyzes the surrounding muscles around the unwanted lines so that when you frown your skin doesn't move. It is great for the forehead and for laugh lines. I saw photos and the results are like a mini-facelift.

There are so many different ways to regain the appearance of youth that it is hard to decide which is best for your specific need. You should meet with your doctor of choice and look at his work. It is as important to like him as it is to like his work and methods. Technique is as important as the substance. After all, a paintbrush doesn't make you Andy Warhol.

Baycrest seniors help needy newborns at Mount Sinai

TORONTO — They work their magic with colourful balls of acrylic.

They are proud grandmothers and great-grandmothers who are affiliated with Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, either as Terrace residents or Wagman members. During the past year, this group of 27 has crocheted and knitted enough baby clothes and blankets to fill several boxes that are destined for newborn babies at Mount Sinai Hospital.

But these aren't just any babies. These are newborns whose parents are in financial hardship. The handmade items are part of layette gift packages that go to these families to ensure their babies are off to a good start.

Babies First Comforts is a seven-year-old project of the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary. With Mount Sinai poised to become the largest birthing centre for Toronto, it expects to handle upwards of 6,000 births annually. Unfortunately, some of the mothers will not have the means to provide clothes for their baby. So, last year, the hospital approached Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary to participate in this special initiative.

"This is a tremendous effort of so many caring people to give these babies a start in life," says Honey Sherman, who co-chairs the project with Penny Etlin.

Back at the Wagman Centre, on a Wednesday afternoon, five women are knitting up a storm. They talk and laugh together like old friends. Their hands work the yarn effortlessly and the little clothes begin to take shape.

Ida Karoly has three great-grandchildren and knows all about making booties, bonnets, sweaters and blankets for little babies. Spending a few hours a week knitting infant clothes for needy families makes her feel good, she says. The others in the group smile and nod in agreement.

Gail Goldenberg, who runs the Wagman Centre art program, says the project with Mount Sinai has been a highlight of her six years with Baycrest. "We feel honoured to be part of this," she says. "The women who are making these tiny clothes feel they are able to give back to the Baycrest community which has given so much to them."

In July, Goldenberg and her group of volunteers were invited to Mount Sinai Hospital for a special luncheon to honour their tremendous dedication to Babies First Comforts. They visited the Neonatal Intensive Care Unit, an experience that was both inspiring and tearful.

"These women have just opened their hearts, it's a win-win situation," says Joy Gales, project liaison who is a vice-president for Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary and a member of the Board of Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary.

Auxiliary president Hinda Silber calls the partnership with Baycrest a "wonderful link of our two institutions, with older people helping the younger ones."

Babies First Comforts needs more knitters, crocheters and quilters. If you would like to volunteer, call the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary, 586-8290, or Gail Goldenberg at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, 785-2500, ext. 2939.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

Q. I love chopped liver and make it often with chicken livers. I have just been told that my cholesterol is high. Do I have to cut out chopped liver. Is liver really high in cholesterol.

A. Liver is high in cholesterol – dietary cholesterol. Cholesterol is stored in the liver in our bodies, as well as in animals' bodies, so it is very concentrated there.

However, dietary fat, the fat that we eat in our diet tends to have a greater effect on our serum C blood cholesterol levels than dietary cholesterol (cholesterol in food) does.

Your main focus should be on reducing saturated fat. But it would also be wise to reduce the amount of chopped liver you consume and the frequency with which you eat it, to assist in lowering and normalizing your cholesterol levels.

Q. Is it true that antidepressants can cause weight gain?

A. It is a fact that antidepressants typically cause an increase in appetite and the increase in appetite could lead to an increase in actual weight.

The Alphabet Talks...

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

By the time you read this book review, you will have been back to school for several days. We at The Canadian Jewish News hope that you all have the best year ever.

I am going to tell you about a terrific book that could be a real help learning the Hebrew alphabet. Even better, you will have a great time going through it.

The book is The Hebrew Letters Tell their Story, by Reuder, who also did some of the art work, along with Jack Knight and Burt Griswold (Pitspopany Press, 1999). It is one of The Doodle Family series, and you will recognize some of the characters from other books in the series, including The Doodle Family Haggadah.

What Reuder has done is to write funny poems, using words that, in Hebrew, start with each letter. For instance, in He's playing guitar/While eating ice cream,/This camel's a star,/And I think he's a scream!" the Hebrew word for camel, gamal, and for ice cream, gleedah, both start with the letter gimmel.

So do surfboard, gahlshahn and rain, geshem.

Other poems talk about a butterfly, pahr-pahr, submarine, tzolehlelet, and space ship, chalelet.

The action takes place, as it only seems right, on the slightly wacky Island of Alef.

Some of the pictures that I especially liked were the monkey pulling a parrot out of a hat, a frog with glasses teaching a class, and a dog in a spacesuit.

In the back of the book is a chart with all the letters that were used in the book, the words that the letters start with, and a guide to how the words are pronounced.

The idea is for the reader to put together the Hebrew words with the picture, and the pronunciation.

Music of the Abayudaya: The Abayudaya, a "lost tribe" of Jews in Uganda, recently recorded a CD of their music. The CD features traditional Jewish liturgy and new compositions set to African melodies and rhythms, sung in English, Hebrew, Luganda and Swahili.

According to one American listener, Mac Sintes, the music "has more of a calypso or Caribbean sound" that almost resembles reggae.

"The music is so different, the people so different and far away, and yet those same familiar, much loved words and phrases [are] offered with the same spirit and devotion," Sintes recently commented in the newsletter of Kulanu, an American organization that helps lost Jewish communities.

The CD is titled Shalom Everybody Everywhere! It is available for $15 US, plus $3 for shipping and handling, from Kulanu, 1217 Edgevale Rd., Silver Spring, Md. 20910-1612.

President Speaks Yiddish: A while ago, American comedian Carl Reiner attended a fund-raising event for the Democratic party at the house of his son, actor-director Rob Reiner, and found that among those in attendance was U.S. President Bill Clinton.

Reiner told Clinton: "Mr. President, you have no idea how much I shep nachas from the fact that my son could invite the president (to his house) and have the president accept."

He also told the president that shep nachas was a phrase he should learn "because you have a daughter Chelsea. You probably have shepped nachas from her already but have not known that you have done that because you have never heard those words."

Reiner asked Clinton if he would like to learn those words, and, upon receiving an affirmative, asked him to repeat the Yiddish phrase. When Clinton did so clear as a bell, Reiner told him: "Mr. President, of all the Christians I have known, that's the best "ch" sound I have heard from a Christian!"

Clinton accepted the compliment graciously.

Film Festival to screen 3 Holocaust documentaries

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Cronenenberg contributed short film to Preludes, a 90-minute movie to be shown at the Toronto International Film Festival.

TORONTO — Three major Holocaust documentaries are among the highlights of the 25th annual Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 7-18.

Fighter, written and directed by Amir Bar-Lev, turns on an unusual road trip.

Two Holocaust survivors from the former Czechoslovakia, Arnost Lustig and Jan Wiener, revisit their birthplace and recall their youth.

Starting as a historical biography, Fighter evolves into a psychological drama played out against an unlikely friendship.

Variety described it as "a powerful, heartfelt and funny documentary."

Into the Arms of Strangers: Stories of the Kindertransport, by Mark Jonathan Harris, tells the stirring story of 10,000 Jewish children from Nazi Germany who found a haven in Britain nine months before the outbreak of World War II in 1939.

The Warner Brothers film, due to open in commercial release after the festival, examines the extraordinary rescue effort and its impact on the lives of the children, who never saw their parents again.

It is narrated by Oscar winner Judi Dench (Shakespeare In Love). The mother of the producer, Deborah Oppenheimer, was a kinder child.

Preludes will feature film by Cronenberg

Paragraph 175 explores the persecution of homosexual men during the Third Reich. The directors, Rob Epstein and Jeffrey Friedman, made The Celluloid Closet, an acclaimed film that examined Hollywood's homophobic approach to homosexuality.

Deriving its name from a section of the 1871 German penal code, Paragraph 175 weaves together personal testimony, images from personal photo albums and archival material.

According to the directors, it marks the first time that this theme has been explored in movie format.

Meanwhile, the Perspective Canada program features three films of Jewish interest.

In a short documentary, The Walnut Tree, Toronto filmmaker Elida Schogt uses her mother's stories and photographs from Holland to develop the theme of memory, the Holocaust and the role of photography in history.

To be screened in a program of experimental films, The Walnut Tree will have its world premiere at this year's festival.

Schogt's first and previous film at the festival, Zyklon Portrait, won several awards.

Francine Zuckerman's Passengers, in which a woman travels with her lover to her father's funeral, is based on a dream and is integrated with autobiographical experiences.

Passengers, she writes in a press note, "examines the issues of life and death, of honesty and truth, of compassion and approval."

"My background as a documentary filmmaker," she adds, "has taught me to delve into the complexities of the human spirit and explore the intricacies of relationships."

Abe's Manhood, by Aubrey Nealon, is described as "a charming mockumentary" which tracks a young man's personal rite of passage to manhood.

It climaxes with a circumcision.

Waiting for Messiah, from Argentine director Daniel Burman, throws together a disparate group of people, Jewish and Christian, as Chanukah and Christmas converge in Buenos Aires.

To mark its 25th anniversary, the festival will screen a 90-minute film called Preludes on Wednesday, Sept. 13.

It consists of 10 short films expressly created for the festival by 10 of Canada's most celebrated directors, including David Cronenberg and Jeremy Podeswa.

The executive producer is Niv Fichman of Rhombus Media.

Preludes will be broadcast by The Movie Network on Saturday, Sept. 16 at 8 p.m.

Musician is upbeat about the Canadian jazz scene

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At eight years old, Winnipeg-born jazz pianist Bernie Senensky had more talent in his little fingers than most budding musicians dream of having in a lifetime.

With practice, Senensky, now 55 and living in Toronto, can boast of a stellar career as an internationally renowned player, composer, recording artist and conductor.

Senensky began his piano training studying the classics with Clara Pearlman. After a few years, the jazz bug hit him.

"I got interested in playing jazz when I heard the Henry Mancini's music from the TV series, Peter Gunn. The show was about a private eye by day that was a jazz pianist in a club at night," explains Senensky. "This is what I wanted to do.

"I then took a couple of lessons from Bob Erlandsen, the best jazz piano player in Winnipeg at the time. I was able to learn from his knowledge and work on it. From then on I was self-taught."

When Senensky, married to Israeli vocalist Ahuva Shai and father of two sons, Doron, 25, and Adam, 20, isn't touring the world with his own jazz group, you can find him sharing the stage with music legends.

These musicians include guitarists Bucky Pizzarelli and Joe Pass, trumpeters Dizzy Gillespie and Art Farmer, saxophonists Pharoh Sanders, Cilfford Jordon and Canadian Moe Koffman, with whom Senensky has both played and recorded over the last 20 years.

Since 1975, the musician has released 12 of his own albums. His latest entitled New Horizons garnered him his third Juno nomination.

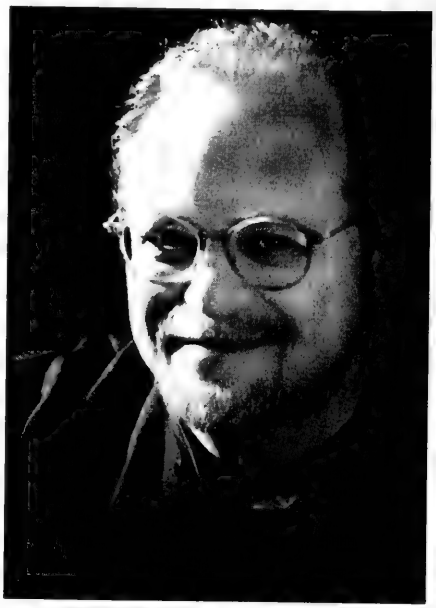
Senensky has future plans to release two more CDs recorded at jazz festivals last year. He can be found on a number of other artists' recordings and has become a staple on many of guitarist Munoz's albums.

In October, he will be off to a New York recording studio once again, to lend his talents to Munoz and saxophonist Dave Leibman.

On film, Senensky arranged, composed, conducted and performed the musical score for the documentary The Vegetarian World narrated by William Shatner.

Senensky recently received, for the second time in four years, the Jazz Report Magazine Award for Best Acoustic Pianist of 1999. He won both the Jazz Report and Socan's Best Jazz Composition of 1999 for his song Blues For Clifford.

"I wrote this tune honouring tenor saxophonist Clifford Jordon after he died," says Senensky.



Bernie Senensky

The pianist was the only Canadian guest on Oscar Peterson Presents, a CTV television series, and appeared on the prestigious Marian McPartland public radio show Piano Jazz.

Writes the score for new documentary

"I like performing in concert because people are there to listen. Clubs are sometimes noisy, although the atmosphere is usually more casual, so there is more chance of exciting things happening on stage because the musicians are more relaxed. Each venue has its own merits," he says.

Senensky feels the Canadian jazz scene is very healthy and is encouraged by the many young performers coming up that really know how to play.

In Hanover, Germany this summer, the pianist performed as a member of the 15-piece group called World on a String, in celebration of Canada Day. The group is now fielding offers from agents in Europe and the States.

Senensky along with Solomon and Israeli violinist Moshe Hammer perform concerts as The Galaxy Trio. The group has recorded a self-titled album and tours extensively in North America. Next spring, there are plans for the trio to celebrate Canada in concert at our embassy in Japan.

"We play mostly for classical audiences, which is exciting for me because I have a chance to play legit classical music. Our program combines standard jazz tunes with pieces written by modern composers. We play one of my tunes called Father Fugue, it is a classical piece with some jazz solos."

Senensky hopes to fly to Poland in November for a concert with his own jazz band. The pianist's next club date is on Sept. 8 and 9 at Manhattans in Guelph. Special guest, trumpeter Sam Noto, will join Senensky's trio.

Discovering Amsterdam

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

AMSTERDAM — The Dutch take pride in their love of art and architecture.

There are over 200 etchings in the Rembrandt house on Jodenbreestraat and the Van Gogh Museum on Paulus. Potterstraat lays claim to the most comprehensive collection of that artist's works under one roof.

The Rijksmueum on Stadhouderskade houses the largest collection of art and history in the Netherlands, including Rembrandt's most famous painting of all – the Night watch.

But Amsterdam is also known, by some, as a place of tolerance. Today, the liberal drug and sex laws are reminders of the 1960s – an era when hippies filled the streets.

Long walks are needed to appreciate the beauty of the cobblestoned city, filled with long thin gabled homes and beautiful houseboats moored along the banks of the many canals.

We begin our tour in the centre of the city at Dam Square which is filled with all sorts of entertainment, from shopping arcades housed in medieval-style castles to street mimists and puppeteers.

Tourists can watch the street shows of medieval knights in armour or sit back in one of the many cafés and watch a parade of tattooed and pierced passers-by, with this season's assorted neon-coloured, jelled and spiked hair styles.

From the city centre, our walk continues through a spectacular floating flower market. Buckets of bright tulips, ubiquitous sunflowers and pastel hydrangea flow in the sun-lit canal beside the cobblestoned street.

A stroll along the city's canals takes us over the Blue Bridge at Waterlooplein and into Amsterdam's Jewish quarter, where the history of the Jewish community is reflected in the many synagogues.

The Portuguese Synagogue, which was formally opened on Aug. 2, 1675, is a large and elegant building with tall columns dividing long thin windows. When it was built, it was the largest synagogue in the world, and inside, the beauty of the reconstructed interior reflects the prosperity of the Jews at that time.

Fleeing the persecution of the Inquisition, Spanish and Portuguese Jews made their way to Amsterdam sometime in the 15th century. The Sephardim in Amsterdam were wealthy merchants and active in artistic and intellectual circles. The pride of their achievements was reflected not only by the splendour of their buildings, but by their very signatures which they followed with a samech and a tet, signifying Sephardi Tahor (pure Sephardi).

Evidence of their presence can be seen throughout the Jewish quarter. At 69 St. Antoniesbreestraat, there is a public library called the De Pinto House. The restored ceiling paintings only hint at the wealth of the Portuguese Jewish merchant who once lived there.

The philosopher Baruch de Spinoza was born and grew up in Amsterdam after his family fled Portugal.

Even today there are still Portuguese names around in the city, reminders of its Jewish Portuguese heritage.

Directly across from the Portuguese synagogue stands the Jewish Historical Museum on Jonas Daniel Meijerplein. Linked together by glass and steel galleries, four former Ashkenazi synagogues display four centuries of Jewish history in the Netherlands.

The museum describes the arrival of Ashkenazi Jews in Amsterdam as they fled pogroms in Poland and Germany.

By the 19th century, the community became active in the diamond industry as cutters. While some Jews became quite wealthy during this time in Holland, many were poor and in the back alleys and sweat shops of the Jewish quarter, the first trade unions in Holland were formed.

This was also a time of Jewish involvement in the Netherlands and the museum describes Jews serving on municipal councils and becoming active in almost every facet of Dutch cultural life as writers, artists and musicians.

Today, the second floor of one of the buildings in the museum is an interactive children's centre. Children are encouraged to write Hebrew letters, listen to Jewish music from around the world, as well as play in a kosher kitchen. While we were there, the children prepared and ate matzah with the help of a museum assistant.

The museum attempts to describe Jewish traditions and beliefs through the display of art exhibits, ceremonial objects and everyday items. The history of several Jewish merchants and workers is portrayed alongside Torah covers, kiddush cups and tallitot in an effort to portray every facet of Jewish life in the Netherlands.

The museum also records the destruction of the Jewish community in Holland. In glass cases, displays record the historical events which sent 100,000 Dutch Jews (80,000 from Amsterdam) to their deaths in the Holocaust.

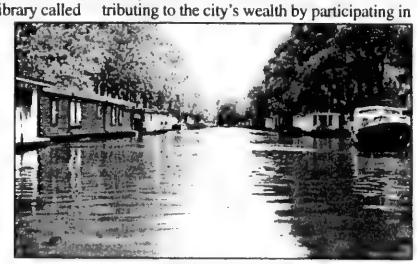
A closer inspection of the city reveals that Amsterdam also has a sinister underside below the beauty of its art and architecture.

You can stroll into the West Indian Company which was founded in 1621.

While Dutch explorers were brutally colonizing America and Africa, the WIC was contributing to the city's wealth by participating in the slave trade which operated between Africa and South America. It is estimated that 10 million slaves were sold by the Dutch.



Houseboats alongside the canals.

The cobblestoned road takes us on to the Anne Frank House.

There is a perpetual line outside the Anne Frank House at 263 Prinsengracht. At the entrance, display cases attempt to explain the history and meaning of the events which led to the hiding of the two Jewish families and dentist during the German occupation of Holland.

A narrow, steep staircase takes you up to empty rooms which contain only a few artifacts – Anne's descriptions from her diary are presented so that the rooms can be recreated in our minds.

Anne's hopes and feelings about Amsterdam and the Dutch people she thought she knew so well are displayed in the writings behind glass cases.

The last room in the house has a video of an eyewitness who saw Anne during her final days in Auschwitz. The video describes Anne's despair as she finally gives up hope.

On the way back to our hotel, we decided to take one of the canal boats that provide a guided tour as they travel along the waterways. It's hard to see the beauty of the city as we think about Anne's betrayal by the Dutch.

As we float past Anne Frank's house, our city tour guide tells us that the Dutch houseboats aren't connected to the city's services. Apparently, the sewage flows right into the canals.

But the Dutch people don't mind, our guide says, because the boats look so beautiful moored on the banks of their city's canals.

Merrill Lynch economist takes global perspective

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For someone who practises the "dismal science," David Rosenberg has a pretty lively sense of humour and a keen sense of irony.

With his tongue planted firmly in his cheek, Rosenberg contends his "claim to fame" was embarking on a career as a Bay Street economist on the same day the market crashed, Black Monday, Oct. 19, 1987.

He followed up that career move with two additional milestones that a superstitious type might have seen as harbingers of disaster. In 1994, he joined BMO Nesbitt Burns right around the time the Mexican peso was devalued and in April of this year, he moved over to Merrill Lynch Canada, just when NASDAQ suffered its worst decline ever, a 10-percent drop in one day.

Short of walking under ladders or getting a black cat to break a mirror on Friday the 13th, Rosenberg's career path appears to have defiantly tempted fate. But well-trained economists and market-watchers know to buy low and sell high. So, from an intermediate-level economist at the Bank of Nova Scotia (BNS), Rosenberg has become a nationally-recognized chief economist for Merrill Lynch Canada, a prestigious international brokerage house.

Those who follow the Canadian economic and business scene readily recognize Rosenberg's name. He's an articulate and knowledgeable analyst, an expert on economic trends and one of a handful of media-savvy commentators who can provide incisive and contextual commentaries on the state of the Canadian economy.

Rosenberg appeared several times on the now defunct CBC show, Face Off, he's been a guest on numerous daytime TV news shows and he appears monthly on Money Talks, a CFRB radio program whose name is pretty much self-explanatory. He's also regularly quoted in the business press on public policy issues, tax cut proposals, regulation, interest rates and the overall state of the economy.

He has built a career that, in some respects, has paralleled the phenomenal growth of the North American markets since that 1987 low.

Rosenberg, who assumed his duties at Merrill Lynch after six years at BMO Nesbitt Burns, believes his latest career move has put him in an economist's Eden.

"For an aspiring economist and strategist, Merrill Lynch is nothing short of a massive global research library," he said. "To have access to research in 35 countries is absolutely overwhelming and it makes my job a lot easier."

The rewards for an economist may be great, but so too are the demands. Rosenberg's job would exhaust most individuals.

His day starts early – he's embarrassed to say precisely how early except to point out he's one of the few drivers on the Don Valley Parkway when he heads into work in the morning. His first task is to complete a three-page morning market memo which he e-mails to clients by 7:30 a.m.

Shortly afterwards he presents a daily briefing to the company's equity and fixed income sales forces in which he looks at "something coming down the pike," such as reports on central banks or an analysis of key economic data.

From there, his day really kicks into gear. He works on reports and economic analyses for Canadian and global clients. Most often he's involved in equity and stock market research and he studies interest rates, bond yields, the state of the dollar and various sectors of the economy.

David Rosenberg – proponent of globalization

Unlike previous positions he's held, his job at Merrill Lynch "is much more global in nature. I'm a Canadian ambassador for Merrill Lynch's global clients. It's a new dynamic."

Although a senior executive in a major firm, Rosenberg, 39, relies on the same credo drummed into the most junior employee in the financial services industry – know your client.

"You take the economics and make it relevant for investors," he said. "For instance, what do forecasts mean for yield curves and stock markets? I tell the younger folk in the business, be relevant. Never put out a report without a conclusion that's going to help investors make a decision."

One of Rosenberg's reports could focus on a provincial government budget, another might examine the state of the Japanese economy.

"One of the beauties of being a Canadian-based economist is that when close to 40 percent of GDP is exported and the capital market is so intertwined with the United States, you are propelled to be a global economist."

Rosenberg's first job after graduating with an MA in economics from the University of Toronto was with Clayton Research, a small Toronto firm that specialized in real estate.

The experience there was quite valuable, he recalls, since it gave him a good introduction into client service and on the multiplier effect of the housing industry through the economy.

From there he moved to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) in Ottawa. At the time, the Mulroney Tories were reviewing all federal programs, including housing, and he was asked to prepare a report on the future of the corporation.

"That's when one of my first frustrations with government took place, with subcommittees of subcommittees and endless meetings."

In the end, he prepared a report "that is essentially collecting dust, since the recommendations we were making could've cost a lot of civil service jobs."

After three years with CMHC, Rosenberg took a pay cut and a demotion to move to Toronto. "I really wanted to get a job on Bay Street," he said. "This was a time when government was breaking barriers between the banks, investment companies, and trusts. A big bang was starting and I wanted to be part of a changing landscape."

Unfortunately, the "big bang" on his first day of work at the Bank of Nova Scotia was Black Monday. The trading floor at the TSE was chaotic. "The closest I've seen to that bedlam was on a trip to Israel at the Jerusalem bus station," he said.

Rosenberg later completed a report examining whether the stock market collapse caused a recession. He concluded it did not, but both were symptomatic of tight monetary policy. Rosenberg believes that "no matter how great the macro-economic backdrop, ultimately it's liquidity that's the lifeblood of markets."

From the BNS, Rosenberg moved to Nesbitt, where he served as senior economist and vice-president.

"It was a terrific experience in terms of honing my public speaking skills and client contact," he said.

At Nesbitt he was heavily involved in putting economic forecasting, exchange rates and macro economics into a market and investment context.

Rosenberg remains a proponent of global economic development. He believes "the arguments of economic nationalists are becoming obsolete." Canada is a trading nation with large balance of payment surpluses, he points out. Furthermore, "there is so much cross-border merger activity, and it's accelerating.

"The whole process towards globalization is a gut-wrenching process," he acknowledges. "It leaves a lot of losers in its track and it creates uncertainty. At the same time, there's no question that at the aggregate level, globalization has enhanced living standards. It hasn't benefitted everybody, but it has benefitted the majority."

After scanning data and figures, the highlight of his day is "making it home and the kids run to the door after 12 hours in the office and two hours on the Don Valley parking lot."

A father of three boys, Rosenberg is married to Rachael Zbar. His family's immediate roots trace back to Winnipeg, where his father, Harry, and mother, Faigel Gorelick, met. His uncle is renowned Yiddishist Noah Wittman.

Toronto rules the pool at JCC Maccabi Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 16, Larry Hasson is one of the veterans of Toronto's JCC Maccabi team. In three trips to the youth games, he's seen it all – young hotshots trying to make a name for themselves, grizzled old veterans hanging on too long, trying to relive past glories.

Not for him the gentle fade out to the oldtimers' league nor the fond reminiscences of the good old days. Nope. Not when you can leave the games in a blaze of glory. So, with time running out in what was likely his last youth games, the Thornlea Grade 11 student decided to kick it up a notch.

As the anchor man on Toronto's 4 x 50 mixed relay team, swimming freestyle, Hasson was completely focused. He'd pre-visualized the race and knew just what he had to do. When his turn came in the key gold-medal race, he entered the water about a half a body length behind the leader, a peach-fuzzed whippersnapper from Washington, D.C.

Drawing on his wealth of experience, Hasson pulled out all the stops and caught his opponent at the turn. Rebounding off the wall, the two swam neck and neck. Until the last few metres it could've been anybody's race. It could've been, but it wasn't. With only a few metres to go, Hasson pulled ahead and edged out his opponent by a full 0.5 seconds. Toronto gold, Washington silver. Take that back to the Beltway you scallywag.

The medal was the second team relay gold earned by Hasson at the junior games in Staten Island, his sixth medal and the Toronto swim team's 78th medal overall. In all, the 17 Toronto swimmers in Staten Island, one of New York's five boroughs, finished tops in medal count, edging out their Australian competition.

Due to an absence of official results as of this writing, the exact number of gold medals is unclear. They range somewhere between 15 and 20, said Grant Smith, head of the Toronto delegation. Overall, Toronto's 57 athletes in Staten Island came home with about 100 medals.

"We ruled in the pool," Smith said. "In previous games, Australia had no competition in swimming but a lot of our kids achieved their best times ever. We made the Australians realize that Toronto swimmers are a class act."

For Hasson, the final 4 x 50 relay "was my last race of my junior Maccabi career. I wanted to go out with a bang, give it all I could and go nuts."

Although it was the end of the fourth day of competition and he'd already swam in 30 other races, Hasson sucked it up and performed as expected.

"I just pulled it together and I was inspired," he said.

He credits his coaches, Alison Lee and her assistant (and sister) Tracy, with helping motivate the team.

In the race, Hasson recorded his best time ever. It's a good thing he did. "It was the hardest competition I've encountered at the junior games," he said, as he no doubt applied some liniment to his tired, aching muscles.

"Australia was strong and Washington had two good swimmers and Toronto was better than before."

A double gold winner in Detroit two years ago and winner of three silver and two bronze last year, Hasson said he felt he improved his swimming technique during the Staten Island games.

The coaches helped motivate him while showing him how to focus and visualize the race before hitting the water, he said.

Larry Hasson

Hasson, who grew up in Cape Town, South Africa, is a provincial-level swimmer in Toronto who hopes to move to a regional level this year.

Butterfly is his favourite event followed by freestyle. He trains at the Markham Aquatic Club.

While the swimmers carried home a basketful of medals, Toronto's team in Staten Island did well in other events as well, Smith stated. In golf, Shawn Hoffman won a silver medal while Ben Guist also won an individual silver to go with a team silver.

The junior boys basketball team lost to Tenafly, N.J. in the final to finish with a silver while the tennis squad's Sam Jonas won gold. He teamed with Rich Srour to win a doubles gold as well.

On the track, Carolyn Barth won three medals (silver and bronze) while Mark Daniels earned a silver in the 110-metre hurdles, finishing second by 1/100th of a second.

The boys soccer team finished fourth.

While sports is the key factor in any JCC Maccabi event, the opening and closing ceremonies were also highlights. The opening event was held in a 6,000-seat theatre in Madison Square Garden while the closing ceremonies were held at the Statue of Liberty.

In Cincinnati, one of five venues to host JCC Maccabi Games this summer, the surroundings may have been more mundane but the competition was equally intense.

Forty-three Toronto athletes participated in the Cincinnati games, mostly in team sports, Smith stated. They were joined by Canadians from Windsor, Hamilton and Calgary while Australians, Israelis and Brits furnished the overseas contingent. Mexico and Venezuela participated in Staten Island.

Toronto picked up three medals in all, a gold in girls basketball, a silver in boys basketball and a silver in boys beach volleyball.

The girls, coached by Ella Ashkinazi and Dena Weinroth, went undefeated through the six-game tournament and repeated as gold medalists. "There weren't many close games," Smith said. "Our girls were confident and well-prepared."

Sporting several rep players who play all year round and "who take basketball seriously," the Toronto team was never challenged, Ashkinazi said.

Miami came closest in a round-robin game, but Toronto won that one by 12. The Toronto girls used a fast breaking offence, good ball control and accurate, long-distance shooting from the field to overwhelm the opposition, Ashkinazi, who coaches at CHAT, said. The three playoff games versus Norfolk, Va., Upper West Side, N.Y. and South Jersey were all run-aways, she added.

The team included: Sabine Goldberg of London, Shauna Eisenberg of Hamilton, and Shayna Partridge, Leah Draper, Shannon Betcherman, Adina Herbert, Lesley Suchter, Amanda Rogers, Annalise Beube and Amy Wilchesky, all of the Toronto area.

The boys lost in the final – by about 10 points – to Orange County, Calif. "Our boys team played above expectations," but lost to a strong American squad, Smith said.

In beach volleyball, Toronto fell three games to two to a team from Rochester, N.Y. The boys baseball team, silver medalists last year, lost in the quarter finals to a strong team from Miami.

With the Olympics just around the corner, organizers of the junior games took the opportunity to educate the young athletes about the Palestinian terror attack that claimed 11 Israeli lives at the 1972 Munich Olympics, Smith said.

Another highlight was the presence of Australian athletes, three years after the bridge collapse at the Maccabiah Games in Israel claimed four lives. "It was good to have them there," Smith said. "The Australians make the games a lot of fun. They're a spirited group that likes competition."

עם עורב, תשנ"ח/1998

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

This is a story that happened to my friends, the Bergs, their pig named Bentley, and their buffalo, whose name I cannot recall.

During a tour and lunch at their farm in Maryland, we were introduced to their pig, Bentley. We also met their buffalo, a mean-spirited male who was not overly delighted to meet us.

We were told to keep our distance – the buffalo was only there for breeding purposes. Our hosts were experimenting with raising buffalo because the meat is lean and the cuts are similar to beef. It is considered a kosher cut, is on some restaurant menus and is sold in specialty meat markets in the United States.

During a recent phone conversation, I asked how Bentley and the buffalo were doing.

"We have terrible news," I was told. Apparently, the bison had attacked Bentley and killed him! The shochet was called and the bison is now in their freezer in the form of buffalo hamburgers and hot dogs!

However, I didn't feel it would be "in good taste" to ask about the whereabouts of Bentley's remains. Sometimes, silence is golden. In my mind, I'll always wonder if Bentley's death affected the kosher status of the buffalo!

P.S. My friend said that the buffalo burgers and hot dogs were delicious! Personally, I prefer buffalo wings.

BAKED BUFFALO WINGS

2 dozen chicken wings or drumettes
½ tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice
Salt & pepper, to taste
½ tsp. each chili powder, paprika & cayenne
2 cloves garlic, crushed
2 tbsp. melted pareve margarine
4 tbsp. hot sauce (e.g., Tabasco, or 2 tbsp. hot sauce plus 2 tbsp. ketchup)
Sauce:
½ cup mayonnaise
½ cup salsa

Cut wings in half at the joints: place in a large bowl. Add oil, lemon juice, seasonings and garlic; mix well. Marinate 30 minutes at room temperature or overnight in the refrigerator. Arrange wings in a single layer on a sprayed foil-lined baking sheet. Bake uncovered in a preheated 375 oven for 25 minutes. Combine melted margarine with hot sauce; pour over wings and mix well. Broil 2 to 3 minutes to crisp up.

Combine mayonnaise with salsa. Serve with wings.

Serves 4 as a main course, 6 to 8 as an appetizer.

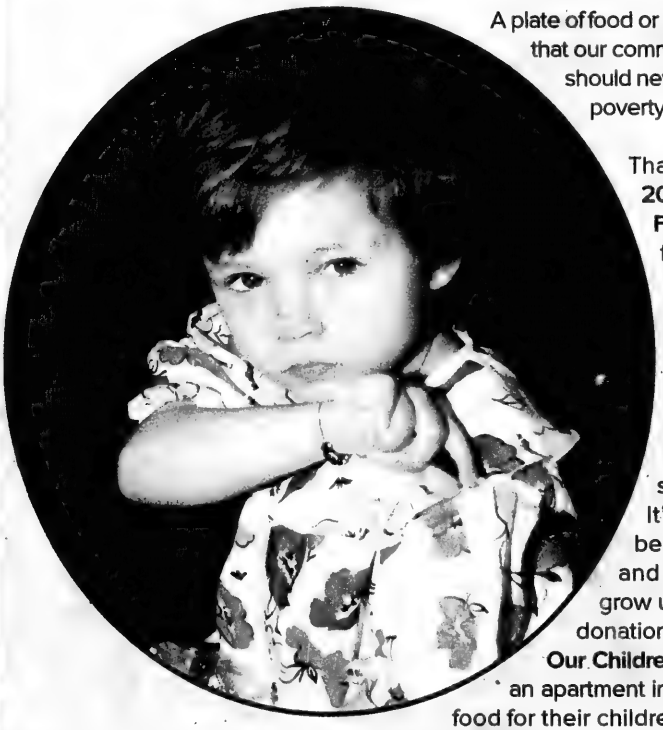
The Campaign For Our Children - Project #1

All our children deserve to grow up free from poverty and violence

When The Rent Is Spent



A plate of food or a place to live. It's an awful choice. A choice that our community's 25,000 low income Jewish parents should never have to make for 7,000 children living in poverty.

That's why UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 is a special initiative – The Campaign For Our Children. Our goal is $45 million - four million more than last year – to help young people in distress and keep a roof over their heads.

Emergency payments prevent eviction for poor Jewish families on the verge of homelessness because their rent is hopelessly late. Over the years, rent subsidies have not kept pace with needs. It's a daily struggle for Jewish families below the poverty line to make ends meet and nearly impossible for their children to grow up in Jewish neighbourhoods. Additional donations to Campaign 2001-The Campaign For Our Children - will help poor Jewish families keep up an apartment in a Jewish environment without sacrificing food for their children. Your increased contribution will help prevent the painful choices that poverty requires.

Emergency rent arrears. It's just one of at least 15 projects planned by the Campaign For Our Children to help children at risk, bring our kids closer to Jewish life and rescue Jews from oppression and anti-Semitism.

The Campaign For Our Children. Because your reasons for giving are growing!

No compromise on Jerusalem: Arafat

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat told U.S. President Bill Clinton last week that he demands Palestinian sovereignty over the Temple Mount.

Arafat said he is unwilling to discuss the American bridging proposals on Jerusalem that were put forward during and after the Camp David summit, Israeli sources, who received a report on the meeting, said.

Rejects Clinton's proposals

In the wake of these statements, Clinton decided not to continue with his mediation efforts between Israel and the Palestinians during the UN Millennium Summit in New York. In the weeks ahead, the United States will try to lead an international effort aimed at persuading Arafat to demonstrate flexibility and agree to resume the negotiations.

Israel will have to see in the coming weeks "whether we have a partner [for peace] or have reached the end of this section of the peace process," Prime Minister Ehud Barak said at a press conference. "I am not optimistic at this stage, but we do have the feeling of very broad backing from the world's leaders," Barak added.

Many of the leaders at the Millennium Summit, including Russian President Vladimir Putin and a series of European leaders, promised Barak that they would join the effort to put pressure on Arafat.

Barak thinks Arafat will find it difficult "to give in," but hopes that the pressure of the international community, the support of which Arafat values, will help budge him.

Survivors and agencies at odds

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

For 50 years, the Jewish people have negotiated with the German government for restitution of monies and property stolen by the Nazis and for compensation for the damages wrought by the evil of Nazism.

Over the last five years negotiations seem to be reaching their resolution on matters such as restitution for unclaimed war-era insurance policies, looted gold and artwork, expanded definitions of suffering and liberalized eligibility criteria, new payments for slave and forced labourers, and settlements from Swiss banks for seized accounts. It is a confusing mix and aging Holocaust survivors have faced a jumbled thicket of overlapping agencies and red tape.

Disagreement over unclaimed Nazi-era property

But the most wrenching battle pitting Jew against Jew, may still loom ahead: what to do with so-called residual funds – property, insurance policies and the like, worth hundreds of millions of dollars – for which there are no direct claimants or heirs.

That's why, this past Monday in New York, the World Jewish Congress announced a new mechanism to determine how to distribute war-era Jewish assets which are not earmarked for claims under current negotiations. The tentatively called Foundation for the Jewish People was to be unveiled Monday night at a gala dinner honouring WJC president Edgar Bronfman, and attended by U.S. President Bill Clinton and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Chrétien, Arafat Talk

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat held talks here last week, before both headed off to the Millennium Summit of world leaders at the United Nations. Arafat met with Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy, and then had a 45-minute meeting with Chrétien. The prime minister called on both sides in the Arab-Israeli dispute to "put some water in their wine," and reach a compromise. Chrétien said he and Arafat discussed the current impasse. "With everyone collaborating and being flexible, I hope they will find a solution to this long-standing problem," Chrétien said.

ISRAEL

Weiz Appeals

JERUSALEM — Daniel Weiz is appealing a deportation order that would see him returned to Canada to face trial in the beating death of 15-year-old Matti Baranovski. Weiz, a soldier, appeared before the Israeli Supreme Court wearing a knitted kippah and told reporters he had become "more Jewish" since being arrested. He maintains he is innocent. In May, a lower court ruled there was sufficient evidence to warrant his extradition.

Survivor as Envoy

JERUSALEM — The government has approved the appointment of former Knesset speaker Shevach Weiss as Israel's next ambassador to Poland. Weiss, a Holocaust survivor born in Poland, currently serves as international chair of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial.

Tel Aviv Goes Green

TEL AVIV — Municipal officials have declared Sept. 22 a "car-free" day, when drivers will be able to park their cars in lots on the outskirts of the city and travel on public buses for free. A number of new bicycle lanes on some of the city's streets will also be inaugurated.

Olmert Likes Idea

JERUSALEM — The mayor of Jerusalem is supporting, for the first time, the idea of declaring the area around the Temple Mount to be under "divine sovereignty." Ehud Olmert said that as long as Israeli police have the right to enter the site, he is not opposed to the idea, which would give Muslims complete access to holy sites in the area. The idea has been raised among Israeli and Palestinian peace negotiators as a way of resolving the dispute over control of Jerusalem and the Old City.

WORLD

Neo-Nazis Raided

BERLIN — German police said last week they confiscated more than 7,500 compact discs of neo-Nazi music as well as other far-right paraphernalia. Authorities in the eastern state of Saxony-Anhalt said 11 sites were raided. They called the raids the biggest blow against the extreme right this year.

Group 'Negligent'

COEUR D'ALENE, Idaho — A U.S. judge has ruled that a white supremacist group was negligent in appointing a security director who was known to be unstable. The ruling against the Aryan Nations paves the way for a jury to assess punitive damages in the case involving two plaintiffs who were shot at and assaulted in front of the group's Idaho headquarters.

Payments Delayed

NEW YORK — Payments to Nazi-era slave and forced labourers from Germany's new $5-billion restitution plan could be delayed until after Jan. 1 due to legal holdups in the United States. A spokesperson for the German firms funding the plan said the U.S. judges who were considering three sets of compensation claims were unlikely to finish their work until well into November.

Vandalism Arrests

TULSA — Two men were arrested this month on charges they desecrated more than 90 Jewish headstones last month in a Tulsa, Okla., cemetery. After the crime, local Jewish, Christian and Muslim leaders and the mayor of Tulsa led a gathering of hundreds in a re-consecration ceremony.

Faiths 'Not Equal'

VATICAN — The Vatican last week rejected what it described as ongoing attempts to depict all religions as equal. The idea that "one religion is as good as another" endangers the Roman Catholic Church's message, according to a declaration by the Holy See's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

Esther Pollard Appeals to Hillary Clinton

TORONTO — The Toronto-based wife of convicted spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard has appealed to U.S. First Lady and Senate hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Esther Pollard sent a letter to Clinton's campaign headquarters, seeking a meeting to talk "wife to wife" to discuss clemency for Jonathan Pollard "as soon as possible."

Esther Pollard wrote the letter after news emerged last week that Clinton had intervened late last month to prevent Jonathan Pollard from being transferred to a prison that his supporters said is dangerous.

"I wish to thank you for expressing humanitarian interest in my husband," wrote Pollard, whose husband has served 14 years of a life sentence for handing secrets to Israel while he worked as a U.S. Navy intelligence analyst.

Political observers say Clinton intervened in Pollard's transfer to try to win back support she has lost among Jewish voters.

Esther Pollard said in her letter: "If there is a silver lining to be found, perhaps it is that I am aware for the first time your humanitarian interest in my husband's welfare. I am hoping that now that it is a matter of public record, you will agree to meet with me as soon as possible to discuss my husband's case."

She concluded: "It is my hope that upon further discussion, wife to wife, your humanitarian concern for the fate of my husband may be publicly expressed in more specific terms as a concern for judicial equality, due process, and the rule of law."

Clinton has not formally responded to the request, but her spokesperson said: "We look forward to discussing this invitation with Mrs. Pollard or her representatives."

Israel said threatened by internal problems

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel is threatened from within by grave internal problems, says the editor of the Jertusalem Report magazine.

And while Israel grapples with these issues, which largely turn on deep-seated divisions within Judaism, Israel's character as a democratic, pluralistic state hangs in the balance, David Horovitz suggested in an interview last week.

By his reckoning, Israel is so sharply divided that its domestic disputes complicate its efforts to reach peace agreements with its Arab neighbours.

Horovitz, who made aliyah from Britain in 1983, was here to promote his book, A Little Too Close To God: The Thrills And Panic Of A Life In Israel (Alfred Knopf).

Also here to deliver a speech at Adath Israel synagogue on behalf of UJA FEDERATION, he said that the absence of tolerance between Israelis practising different kinds of lifestyles is at the core of the malaise which afflicts Israel today.

Intolerance is bred by a lack of education, information and leadership, said Horovitz, a former reporter with the Jerusalem Post.

Citing a current example, he spoke of the "vicious campaign of delegitimization" being mounted by haredim against the Reform movement in Israel.

"If we let them, our internal disputes, our anger, cynicism, mistrust and intolerance, will destroy our society, ruin our relationship with Diaspora Jews, return us to our status of international pariah," he warns in A Little Too Close To God, an impassioned and impressionistic account of Israel at the dawn of a new century.

He said that Israel is still trying to find "a middle ground" on religion, so that all Israelis can freely practise "their own interpretation of their faith."

'We need teachers, sifrei Torah'

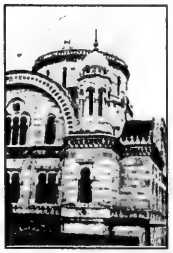
From the editor's desk

The synagogue in Florence is itself a work of art, an architectural testament to the creative genius of the human being, even as the faith worshipped within its breathtaking precincts is a timeless testament to the creative genius of the God in whose service the synagogue stands.

Set back some 30 metres behind a sturdy, protective wrought iron fence on Via Farini, the synagogue looms before the visitor as an invitation to experience an esthetic of design, construction and spirit commingled into one inspiring form.

The shape of the synagogue is borrowed from the ancient Byzantine world: arches, domes and bulbous cupolas. But its decorative style, inside and out, is distinctly Moorish: rich tableaux of meticulous, geometric patterns of kaleidoscopic symmetry.

Three architects in the mid-19th century – Marco Treves, Mariano Falcini and Vincenzo Micheli – applied their skills and invested their aspirations into the building. In 1882 it received its first worshippers.



The synagogue in Florence.

The Nazis attempted to destroy the synagogue in 1944 but managed "only" to damage it severely. After the war it was restored to its original form. Today, it is an even larger complex with a home for seniors, a museum, a school and a newly established beit midrash adjacent.

Approximately 1,000 Jews live in Florence today, half the number that lived in the city before World War II. The leader of the Jewish community is Joseph Levi, a youthful 54-year-old rabbi, scholar, teacher, philosopher and psychologist.

Rabbi Levi was born in Tel Aviv but was raised in Jerusalem. His parents, both from the north of Italy, moved to Palestine in 1935 to help build a Jewish state in the Jewish homeland away from the demeaning ideology of Italy's fascist rulers.

Rabbi Levi is soft-spoken but extremely well-spoken. Fluent in four languages, he carefully searches for and finds le mot juste to convey the full nuance of his thoughts.

In an interview in his office in the early evening of a mid-August Sunday, he shares his thoughts and his hopes with two visiting Canadians.

Rabbi Joseph Levi

The Jewish community in Florence has a long history. Most scholars believe that Jews first settled in Florence (Firenze, in Italian) during the late 14th century. Rabbi Levi authoritatively tells his guests that the Jews first settled in Florence in large numbers after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain and then Portugal in the late 15th century.

One century later, in the late 16th century, they were forced to move into the ghetto by order of the pope.

The extent of Jewish involvement in the flowering of the region's history and civilization is a point that the eloquent rabbi emphasizes. From their very earliest days in Florence, Rabbi Levi asserts, "Jews were always involved in Florentine life," that is to say, in its commercial, artistic and intellectual pursuits.

"Now," Rabbi Levi says sotto voce, "the community is rather assimilated, partly due to the effect of the Second World War and partly due to the long tradition of assimilation of Italy's Jews."

But, assimilation is a call-to arms for the youthful rabbi rather than a statement of resignation. Ever since his arrival in Florence five years ago, he has determined to resist and even to reverse the pattern.

The community has a two-day-a-week Talmud Torah and activities for its university-age students.

"Next week," the rabbi proudly tells his visitors, "we are going to open a beit midrash." It is the first beit midrash in Florence in many years.

But the rabbi is not shy about telling his visitors, and through them Canadian Jewry, that the Jews of Florence need their help.

"We are fighting for survival."

In 1966, the great flooding of the banks of the River Arno destroyed 92 sifrei Torah and more than 15,000 volumes of sifrei kodesh in the synagogue.

They have never been replaced. How could they by so small a community?

Thus, Rabbi Levi fervently pleads for the Jews of North America to take heed of and help his community. "The communities of Florence, Venice and Rome, should be put on the international map of Jewish life and history along with the communities of eastern Europe. We need teachers, rabbis, and especially sifrei Torah.

"Jews can live here either as Marranos, or we can live here as Jews," Rabbi Levi proclaims. It is clear to the visitors that this proud and determined scion of the golden days of Spanish Jewry will once again flourish as a community of Jews in the city of Florence. —MBD

New CHAT branch opens smoothly

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The new Richmond Hill campus of Community Hebrew Academy opened smoothly last week. At least as smoothly as any school opens.

"There were the usual things that happen the first day of school, like last minute timetable changes, but nothing major," said Gary Levine, CHAT vice-principal in charge of the new facility.

Last summer, there was considerable opposition from some parents and students about the move, which involved all students entering Grade 9 who live in York Region.

Concern was expressed about the long commute, the separation from the main CHAT campus including the possible lack of school spirit and activities, and the lack of Jewish amenities in the area.

The school formerly housed Richmond Hill High School. It is now under the auspices of the Conseil scolaire de district du Centre-Sud-Oues, the French school board. For now, CHAT shares the building with Rivendell Hall International School, a private school offering the International Baccalaureate program.

Careful planning went into the 2000-2001 experience. Besides the orientation given to all Grade 9 students, Levine invited the youngsters to "just come in" the week before, to see the place, get ready for the start of school, or "just to hang out."

Many of them also helped set up for a carnival, open house and barbecue which were to be held the first week.

The four bus routes transporting the students from different parts of York Region got them to school on time. There is also a special "minyan bus," Levine said, which gets interested students to the school in time for the 7:30 a.m. minyan.

Once extra-curricular programs get started, there will also be a late bus, leaving the school at 6 p.m.

The Richmond Hill site is still very much part of CHAT, said Levine. There will soon be a Grade 9 expedition to Playdium, "just for fun," Levine said. There will also be a melave malkah before Selichot services on Sept. 23, and adult education programs which will serve the whole student and parent body.

Levine said that the 180 students at CHAT Richmond Hill will hold elections for student council and athletic council later this month.

Hate propaganda on Web can't be tracked, CJC told

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto Hate Crimes Unit, with only three members, is unable to monitor the flow of hate propaganda on 2,500 Internet Web sites.

This was disclosed at the annual security meeting of the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress, which was attended by the Ontario Provincial Police, and police forces from Toronto, York, Peel and Durham regions.

Det.-Const. Samuel Sam of the Toronto unit, said the Internet provides "a wide open door and a boost" to hate material, and in response to a query from Ellen Cole, chair of the CJC community relations committee (CRC), he said his unit did not have enough personnel to monitor it.

Quoting figures from the Simon Wisenthal Centre, author and lawyer Warren Kinsella said the "racist right" has gained new power from its ability to use the Web sites.

He was challenged by vice-chair Frank Bialystok who said Sam's report had indicated anti-Semitic incidents in Toronto were down from 35 last year to 11 to date in 2000.

"This is because Ontario is booming economically. The real problem will come when times are tougher," Kinsella replied.

Blacks are the chief victims of hate crimes in the city, with Jews and gays "flip flopping" for second and third place, Sam said.

The Alliance party and its leader Stockwell Day are promoting anti-abortion and anti-gay views, Kinsella said.

A defeated Liberal party candidate in the North Shore Vancouver area in the last federal election, Kinsella asserted: "People in the Jewish community are being used by Stockwell Day. I know there are people in this room who have joined the Alliance. I would urge Jews to properly inform themselves of Stockwell Day's views."

He said he has visited Web sites created by Stockwell Day, Sr.

"I have heard from him that Canada should not allow people in 'who do not look like us.'"

In other security issues, a warning was issued that people looking after synagogue security in the forthcoming High Holy Days should politely ask people they don't recognize to identify themselves.

Members of the CRC committee, representatives of synagogues and community groups attended the meeting.

Jackie Mason bringing unique style to Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "What do I think about Joseph Lieberman running for vice-president?"

Jackie Mason's voice crackled over the long distance phone from New York, in his inimitable, jerky way.

"I'll tell you what I think. The Jewish people are a sick society. They're always worried about a pogrom.

"Anyway whenever Lieberman speaks he contradicts himself."

Mason is presenting his show Much Ado About Everything at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts (formerly the Ford Centre) Nov. 14 to Dec. 3, and he promises it will be all new material.

"If I repeat one joke, the critics are ready to tear me up. I'm not talking about you. I know you have to make a living."

Asked if he intends to make any comments about Israeli politics, the comedian responded, "Of course I will, but if I give it to you for nothing, who will come to see my show?"

Mason will have plenty to say about the undercurrent of jealousy between the Jewish communities of Montreal and Toronto. "Once they move to Toronto, the Montrealers say Montreal is too American, it's too noisy, it's this, it's that. If you say anything nice about Montreal, they say, 'Drop dead by Thursday.'

"I've never seen people change so much. They have only good things to say about Toronto."

Jackie Mason

The comedian, who was ordained as a rabbi, has three brothers, a father, a grandfather, a great-grandfather and a great-great-grandfather who were rabbis.

The reason he left the rabbinate, he said, "was because somebody in the family had to make a living."

There will be no shortage of Canadian material in the show, he said. "I know all about your 15 percent tax, and that frankfurters cost $704 in Canada."

Mason will take shots at sports utility vehicles, bottled water, designer coffee, Donald Trump, George W. Bush, racial diversity and equal opportunity.

Previews of Much Ado About Everything begin Nov. 14, the day of the election in United States, but Mason said he will vote at an advance poll.

Opening night for the show is Nov. 21. It is being presented in association with Hummingbird Centre. Ticket prices range from $45 to $75, with a 25 percent discount on a family four-pack for Sunday matinee performances only.

Israel's deputy Speaker to attend conference

By ANNA MORGAN
CJN Staff

TORONTO — As deputy Speaker of the Knesset, Naomi Chazan says her most challenging job is to tell people to be quiet. And in Israel, that's no small task.

Naomi Chazan

It is up to the deputy Speaker to make sure that the sessions run smoothly, Chazan said in a telephone interview. On a practical level, that would mean chairing the sessions when the Speaker isn't available, as well as setting the agenda for the Knesset each week.

Chazan will be a guest speaker at a Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem conference, celebrating 75 years of the university's achievements and honouring its past presidents.

Chazan's father, Avraham Harman, was the president of the Hebrew University from 1968 to 1983 and chancellor from 1983 to 1992.

As a member of the Meretz party, Chazan became a member of Knesset in 1992. Before that, she was a professor of political science and African studies at the Hebrew University, where she also chaired the Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace.

Comparing her life as an academic to her life as a politician, Chazan said that "being an academic and being a politician are very different things.

"At the Knesset, politicians are like dilettantes – they make a lot of decisions on a lot of different subjects that they know very little about. Academics, on the other hand, are much more specialized. They know more and more about the same area of specialty.

"At the university, the rules of the game are very clear. You teach, you publish, and you get promoted. In politics," she said, "there are no rules. You never know when you could get stabbed in the back.

"When you are an academic, there are no illusions of power. But," Chazan said, "in politics you don't necessarily have power, but you may have illusions.

"The pace is also completely different in the political world where you're always on the go – sometimes working 18 hours a day.

"In the academic world," she said, "the product is very clear, but in politics, except for lawmaking, most of the work is around being able to influence other policy-makers, and achievements are somewhat ambiguous."

Chazan, who has a BA and MA from Columbia University in New York, and a PhD from the Hebrew University, is currently a member of the Knesset committee for foreign affairs and defence, as well as the economics committee. Her previous duties have included sitting on the committee for the examination of the Maccabiah bridge disaster, and the committee for the advancement of the status of women.

"In Israel today, 15 out of 120 members in the Knesset are women. While that's the most there have ever been, it is only 12½ percent. In percentage terms, that is abominable," Chazan said.

"One of the reasons there is such a low representation of women in the Knesset because of the increasing strength of the religious parties, which are all male."

Yet, women are the best parliamentarians here, she said. "Fifty percent of the legislation in the Knesset has been put forward by women.

Over the past decade, the rights of women have improved, Chazan said. "We've dealt with issues like affirmative action, sexual abuse laws, violence against women and equality for women in the army.

"While our legislation is the most progressive in the world, we face problems with implementation and with cultural and religious barriers for women.

"In Israel today, the proportion of women in the educated population is nearing 57 percent – which places us at either first or second in the world," she said. "Our problem is translating our achievements into positions and influence."

Chazan will be speaking about the current Israeli political situation and women in politics on Sunday Sept. 24 at The Inn on the Park. Other participants in the conference include professors Frances Raday, Alan Rosenthal, Daphne Atlas, Yair Zakovitch and Alex Lubotzky. The 75th anniversary celebrations will open Sept. 23 at the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts with singer Michael Burgess and keynote speaker Harvey Krueger, who is vice-president of Lehman Brothers. Hit-and-run driver gets home sentence

TORONTO — The hit-and-run motorist who fled the scene following a car accident involving a respected 88-year-old leader in Toronto's Orthodox Jewish community has been sentenced to a nine-month sentence, to be served at home.

Mr. Justice Antonio DiZio last week sentenced Bernard Rivero, 40. The nine-months are to be accompanied by 100 hours of community service and probation.

The judge said jail was appropriate, but allowed Rivero to serve the sentence at home because of his remorse, his guilty plea and his clean record. There was no evidence of impairment.

Almost a year ago, Rivero drove his sport utility vehicle over Moishe Nussbaum, who may have collapsed on his way to synagogue in the Bathurst-Wilson area. At the time, police said that Nussbaum was nearly impossible to see because it was dark, he was dressed in black, and could have been lying on a black roadway.

Rivero left the scene, soon returned, but fled again. He turned himself in to police 11 days later.

Intransigent, Arafat offers little optimism

The Central Council of the PLO on Sunday concluded a two-day conference in Gaza by confirming there would be no unilateral declaration of Palestinian independence (UDI) by Yasser Arafat this week. As if there ever could have been! Such a declaration would have put paid to any further negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, thus enshrining the status quo as the international border between Israel and "Palestine" and ending all discussions regarding the return of Palestinian refugees, compensation, water rights and Jerusalem.

The inevitably orchestrated Palestinian violence, in its undoubtedly deadlier form, would have been met with justifiably deadlier Israeli defence. Apart from irregular, terrorist forces, few Arab armies would have come to the aid of the Palestinian side, because few Arab countries would have truly supported this latest blunder in the long list of historic blunders by the Palestinian leadership.

The United States and Europe would have condemned the violence and perhaps even Israel for resorting to markedly heightened measures in defending Israelis, but in the circumstances, would have exacted no diplomatic price.

A unilateral declaration by Arafat would have appeased the hate-filled extremists but disquieted the many – hopefully, majority – Palestinians who understand what truly is at stake in the negotiations with Israel and what would have been lost to them, yet again.

But even though the PLO's disavowal of UDI, for now at least, was greeted as a "positive step" by the government of Israel, the accompanying rhetoric was anything but.

Arafat was reported to be "unbudging" on the issue of sovereignty over the Temple Mount. Worse than his seeming unwillingness to "budge," however, is his repeated deliberate Islamicization of the negotiations with Israel. He has told U.S. President Bill Clinton, and of course every media outlet, that he "represents not only the Palestinian people but the whole Muslim world."

If the PLO chairman persists in purporting to speak for the whole Muslim world, there is indeed very little room for optimism that a solution will be found, despite the anticipated intensity of discussions between the parties over the next few weeks.

After having fought since the late '60s to be the sole leader of the campaign for Palestinian statehood, Arafat is now effectively surrendering the final say on the possibility of a peace treaty with Israel to the leaders of "the whole Muslim world," presumably, Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Indonesia. How ironic. How foolish. What a blunder.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Day's values not laudable

Michael Taub's contention (CJN, Sept. 7) that Stockwell Day's values champion Jewish concerns and interests is not in keeping with Day's expressed policies. Every voter should remember that The Canadian Alliance is the re-incarnation of the Reform party and is heavily supported by neo-conservative politicians.

Judaism has an expressed concern for the stranger, the poor and the needy. Day's economic and social policies, including the flat tax and a private tier to health care would benefit the wealthy at the expense of everyone else. Eliminating women's reproductive choice by Day's policy of criminalizing abortion would propel us back 40 years with dangerous, life-threatening back-room abortions.

Support for funding for religious schools is a paltry reason to support a party whose major appeal is individual self-interest rather than the social welfare of our entire community. The latter is congruent with core Jewish social and ethical principles.

As Jews we should be wary of politicians who court us on educational matters when the philosophical basis of the Alliance on most issues is anathema to Jewish values.

Supportive of women saying Kaddish

Re: the article by Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz (CJN, Sept. 7). I am saying Kaddish for my son who passed away on April 18. I go to shul twice a day and have yet to encounter any negativity from either my co-daveners or the clergy. Everyone has been supportive and empathetic and I find there is an aura of peace in the synagogue surroundings.

In these modern times, when women are called up to the bimah, it is only right that we too should be able to say Kaddish for our loved one and be able to participate together with the men.

The next positive step will be to count us as part of a minyan, especially when there is a shortage of men and a plethora of women in attendance.

Ontario violates Olympic charter

The following excerpt is from the Olympic charter. Clearly Ontario is a violator of the Olympic spirit and should not be qualified to host the Olympic games.

"The goal of the Olympic movement is to contribute to building a peaceful and better world by educating youth through sport practised without discrimination of any kind and in the Olympic spirit, which requires mutual understanding with a spirit of friendship, solidarity and fair play."

On Nov. 5, 1999, the UN found Ontario to be a violator of human rights in its discriminatory policies towards funding of non-Catholic schools. The federal government did not intercede, as it felt that "discrimination in education is a provincial matter." With this logic, there would still be segregation in the U.S. South.

Perhaps the government will listen if they felt that Ontario would lose the Olympics. We have no higher moral entitlement to host the Olympics than China, which is also a violator of human rights.

Peres not trusted by Israelis

One would expect a bit more balance in Shira Herzog's commentary on Israel, Zionism and Shimon Peres. (CJN, Sept. 7)

Herzog referred to Peres as a "statesman par excellence, a populist, one of the greatest visionaries in Israel, etc." Allow me to remind Herzog that as leader of the Labour party in 1981, Peres called Menachem Begin's courageous decision to bomb the nuclear reactor in Iraq, a "political bombing." What would have been the consequences in the 1991 Gulf War had this reactor not been destroyed?

Peres has been a perpetual loser because he has not been trusted by the Israeli electorate, his own Labour party or even Yitzhak Rabin.

His latest humiliating defeat was not just as a result of the Shas vote, but of the fact that the secret ballot allowed Knesset members in his own party to vote against him.

The sad part is his metamorphosis, thanks to the influence of Yossi Beilin, to the new post-Zionism, and his belief that a secular state will solve the Mid-east problem.

Re-examine our priorities

The report by Carleton University Prof. Allan Moscovitch (CJN, Aug. 31) about the high rate of poverty among Jewish Canadians is upsetting and raises some serious questions about priorities. As a longtime supporter of the United Jewish Appeal, the Jewish National Fund and various Canadian Friends of whatever, I recognize the valuable work those organizations do in bettering life for Israelis. There must come a time when Jews in the Diaspora recognize that the State of Israel is not a Third World country and should be able to fund its own infrastructure. This is not to suggest that support should cease, but rather that some proper balance should be established between the needs of those Canadian Jews living in poverty and the projects and institutions supported from abroad.

Iran's nuclear potential

By REUVEN PEDATZUR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Upon learning that the scientific conference in which I would be participating would also be attended by three nuclear scientists from Iran, my belief was that they would do their best to distance themselves from the "Israeli enemy" and avoid talking with me.

Imagine my surprise when, immediately after the conference was convened and even before the official discussions had begun, the three Iranian delegates took the initiative and entered into a friendly conversation with me.

During the course of the conference, the four of us had long and fascinating talks. It was a totally unexpected opportunity for me to learn about the general mood in Iran, about the way Iranians perceive Israel and about the Iranian leadership's strategic plans.

The good news is that if these three scientists represent the attitudes of the Iranian public, Israel is perceived by Iran as a friendly state that shares many common interests with the Iranian people. The official position of the country's Islamic leadership is viewed by its people as merely a tactic that will ultimately change – at some point in the not-too-distant future.

The bad news is that Iran is energetically working on a nuclear weapons development program. None of the three Iranian delegates was willing to admit this fact; to the contrary, all three insisted that such a program did not even exist. Nevertheless, certain factors – data on nuclear reactors nearing completion, additional information on Iran's missile program and the arguments the Iranian participants at the conference used to justify their country's activities in the nuclear field – seemed to convince the majority of the other delegates that Iran is, in fact, well on its way to accumulating its own arsenal of nuclear weapons.

Work on the country's two nuclear reactors – each with a capacity of 1,000 megawatts – in Bushar on the coast of the Persian Gulf actually began during the reign of the Shah; however, for two decades, in the wake of the Islamic revolution, all construction operations were halted.

The construction work was resumed only in 1998, with Russian technology replacing the Western know-how on which the original blueprints had been based. According to the Iranian delegates, work on one of the reactors will be completed within less than two years.

The attempts of the three Iranian scientists to explain that the operation of the nuclear reactors is vital for the production of electricity in their country brought a smile to the faces of the other conference participants. After all, Iran has vast crude oil and natural gas reserves, more than enough to provide all of the country's energy needs for hundreds of years.

One never knows, said one of the three, perhaps tomorrow their country will run out of oil and then Iranians would be forced to turn to nuclear energy.

Suspicions regarding Iran's true intentions in the nuclear field intensified when, in the framework of his lecture, one of the Iranian delegates noted that an important function of the nuclear reactors in Bushar would be to serve as a deterrent force vis-a-vis Iran's enemies.

The lecturer was asked how a nuclear reactor that has been designed to generate energy and is constructed by a country denying any intention of manufacturing a nuclear weapon from the products yielded by such a reactor could serve as a deterrent to other countries.

In response to the question, the Iranian delegate merely shrugged his shoulders and smiled. He also elegantly evaded the argument that it makes no sense to develop long-range missiles unless you plan on arming them with non-conventional warheads.

The consensus among the other delegates was that it is thoroughly illogical to invest such huge sums of money and such massive efforts in the development and manufacturing of long-range ballistic missiles if, in the end, you will be arming them with conventional warheads.

The other delegates also refused to buy the argument that Iran is continuing to build the nuclear reactors because of the national pride of the Iranian people.

Iran's nuclear program occupied a prominent place in the conference's discussions, with the participants given statistics and assessments that raised serious question marks regarding the denials made by the Iranian scientists.

Russian assistance in the construction of the two Iranian nuclear reactors is not limited to the narrow field of energy production, argued some of the delegates, but is also expressed in the transfer of the technology needed for the development of nuclear weapons.

According to Western and Russian nuclear experts who attended the conference, Iran's principal problem in the nuclear field is how to obtain fissionable material – the primary, essential component in the production of a nuclear bomb.

Various conjectures were raised regarding possible sources that Iran could use or was using. There were also references made to reports, based on information gathered by American intelligence agencies, that fissionable material has been smuggled from Kazakhstan into Iran.

In public discussions, the three Iranian delegates adopted their country's official line on Israel; however, in my private talks with them, which took place beyond the earshot of the other participants at the conference, the Iranians emphasized that their personal attitudes were quite different.

They told me that the consensus in the Iranian public is that Iran and Israel have a common enemy – Iraq. Moreover, they reiterated again and again, their view that the Israel Air Force's attack on Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981 benefited the entire region.

Tehran was overjoyed and breathed a sigh of relief when it learned of the destruction of the Osirak nuclear reactor. The Iranians also regarded the operation as further proof that their country shares many common interests with Israel.

All three Iranian delegates were convinced that Israel has nuclear weapons, estimating that there are at least 200 bombs in the Israeli nuclear arsenal. However, although they regard Israel as a nuclear power, they do not consider Israel a threat to Iran.

They believe that the strategic alliance between the two countries that came to an end with the downfall of the Shah will eventually be renewed. As they see it, Iran and Israel still have many common interests, a fact that cannot be overshadowed by the declaration of the country's leadership that the struggle against Zionism must be continued.

The Iranian delegates repeatedly told me that the only country in the Middle East on which Iran can rely is Israel. Iraq is not the only threat, they said, Iran has no faith in any of the Arab states. Thus, they maintained, the former alliance between Tehran and Jerusalem will one day be renewed because it is vitally needed by both Iran and Israel.

The principal conclusion from the analysis offered by the Iranian scientists is that their country is in the advanced stages of its program to develop a nuclear bomb, although Tehran has not yet formulated a nuclear policy.

It would seem that within the foreseeable future, Iran will be prepared to negotiate with Israel on the creation of new strategic game rules.

Barak beckons Iran through Annan

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week asked UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to ask Iranian President Mohammed Khatami if Iran is ready to start a dialogue with Israel.

According to the international Arab daily Al-Hayat, Iranian sources in New York said Barak asked Annan to tell Khatami that Israel hopes the president will help bring about the release of the 10 Jews convicted of spying.

According to the Iranian sources, Barak mentioned that Iranian public figures had met last week in New York with Jewish leaders and members of Congress.

Quoting "other diplomatic sources," the paper said the United States, which also seeks rapprochement with Iran, supports the Israeli gesture.

The report said U.S. officials had taken note of the "positive position" Iran took at the end of last month during the conference on Jerusalem in Agadir, Morocco. The view of the Iranian sources was that the United States and Israel were not interested in "upsetting Tehran" during this critical phase of the peace process.

In addition, the sources said, Israel and the United States sent signals to Iran about their readiness to let Tehran "play a large role on the Iraqi question."

As to the Jews from Shiraz who were convicted of espionage, the Iranian sources said that the level of attention the affair had attracted was helpful to Iran's interests because the case could create an opening for dialogue with the United States.

Opinions

Of German Christians who convert

Recently, the media reported on billions of dollars awarded to former slave labourers, many of them Jews. Private German enterprises that profited from indentured workers during World War II have now tried to make amends, and the German government has supported the restitution with additional funds.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

But it is not only corporate amends that are being made for past sins; there are also individuals who have tried to do this on their own — and money has nothing to do with it.

Some time ago, the Jerusalem Post reported on these individuals, and what they have done to make up for their nation's misdeeds is indeed remarkable and, for many people, hard to believe.

Here are some snapshots from the Post article, which will convey something of the strange effects that the Holocaust has had on these people, and so long after the terrible deeds were perpetrated.

"A tall, blue-eyed blonde from a prosperous village near Heidelberg was visiting Israel. She was 23 years old when she arrived and, in the course of her stay, she not only fell in love with the land but also began to identify with Jews as a people. She applied for conversion and was accepted by the rabbinic authorities, even though conversions tend to be generally discouraged rather than encouraged."

"In the Orthodox Kibbutz Yavneh, near Ashdod, which offers a five-month crash course for prospective converts, Germans now account for about a quarter of the 20 or so students during each term," says program director Miriam Schlusselberg. "They study Tanach and the minutiae of religious rites, and are taught to live an Orthodox life.

"What motivates these persons?" muses Schlusselberg. "They may feel they want to compensate for what happened during the War. But as individual persons they are very far removed from the Holocaust, and I have not heard any of them say that they want to convert because of the Shoah."

Obviously, they find something in Israel that they missed at home. "I could never go back to Germany," said one of the converts, "for here in Israel is where I belong."

When I read this, it underscored an old truth for me: at every point where we touch on the Shoah we find something that is inexplicable. The event itself was of such proportions and complexities that it seems to escape rational analysis. The fallout continues, even though two generations have passed since the event. How long its effect will last, no one can say. But its far-reaching impact is undeniable, and the fact of German Christians becoming Jews is one of the latest examples.

Read my lips, says Barak

Israelis find Prime Minister Ehud Barak a bit confusing. Two months ago, with Shas in his coalition, he presented the Knesset with a bill entrenching the exemption from military service for haredi yeshiva students. Two weeks ago, with Shas out of the government, he announced a "secular-civil revolution" that could dramatically redraw the political balance on religious-secular relations in the country. One week later, the same principles were redrafted by Shlomo Ben-Ami, a senior Labour cabinet minister, under the heading of a "civil-social reform."

Shira Herzog in Toronto

What is Barak really up to?

In its most recent version, the platform contains several related principles, carefully drafted to appeal to a broad spectrum of Israelis, including the traditionalist centre. These include a basic curriculum of general studies in all state-supported schools, including the haredi ones; no preferential treatment for haredi schools in allocation of resources; an effective dismantling of the ministry of religious affairs and transfer of its functions to municipalities; and a key element: completion of the process leading to an Israeli constitution that will incorporate freedom of religion. In Israel, these are all code words for sweeping changes that could include civil marriage as an alternative to the Orthodox monopoly on marriage and divorce, and national service for all Israeli citizens that would effectively compel the haredi community to participate.

Loyal supporters see this as Barak's opportunity to move on an agenda he believes in but could not implement as long as he was dependent on Shas. Cynics see this as a transparent ploy to regain support in the secular centre and, more importantly, the Russian immigrant community. Both groups acknowledge that Barak is preparing his domestic agenda for the next election campaign, which will likely take place in the spring of next year.

Ironically, just as on the peace issue, a strong majority of Israelis supports the policies in the plan, while support for Barak himself is at an all-time low.

The religious parties have torpedoed the completion of a constitution for decades, but with the influx of over 200,000 Israeli citizens who are not halachically Jewish among the Russian immigrants, there is a growing recognition in moderate religious circles that adjustments to the religious-secular status quo are required. The question is whether this should be enshrined in a constitution or in a less-binding "covenant."

The current Knesset is unlikely to support any legislative initiatives to implement the new program, simply because it is determined to topple Barak, who has lost his working majority. But three points are relevant in any analysis of the plan. First, it is targeted primarily at the Russian Israeli voters, without whom Barak would have lost last year's election. A majority of Russians supported him precisely because he separated himself from Shas, with whom the Netanyahu coalition was identified. Natan Sharansky's appointment as minister of the interior – a post which has traditionally been a bastion of the religious parties – was the concrete expression of this promise. These voters are against major concessions to the Palestinians, in favour of more secularization, and strong supporters of a constitution. However, they are not naive and do not want to be the political football in the already polarized debate over these fundamental issues.

Second, Barak is counting on support from the Likud for this initiative – both now and later, after the next election. He hopes that Ariel Sharon will join him to isolate Shas and the other religious parties. Sharon may have his own reasons to support or oppose the plan, but Yossi Beilin and Dan Meridor have argued for years that given the electoral system, the only way to break Shas' hold in the post-peace era is through a merger of the secular and traditional centre, meaning a Likud-Labour union. This may be premature, but it is not far-fetched.

Finally, Barak's weakness over the last year is also his weakness in marketing his agenda. This brilliant, forceful man has failed miserably at managing political matters in his own party and with others. His lack of consultation, his transparent reliance on polls, and his repeated lack of understanding of the basics of domestic realpolitik have created the credibility gap that now plagues him. At best, this latest "revolution" is likely to become his platform for the early election he will inevitably face, with or without a peace deal.

Jews, religion and the public square

American Jews are among the most liberal Americans, and nowhere is this liberalism as pronounced as on issues affecting what is called "religion and the public square." They love the fact that unlike, say, Israel, there is no established American church or official state religion. (Sort of. Isn't Sunday the day of rest, and are not Christmas and Easter recognized as national holidays? Oh well … these are rather minor.)

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

American Jewish organizations are also fanatic in their support of "separationism," which means the strict separation of church and state. In particular, they oppose any government support for organized religion, including Judaism. No nativity scenes or Chanukah candles or prayer in public schools. No state support or vouchers for private religious schools.

Just as they oppose government mixing in religion, they oppose religion mixing in politics. American Jews have long feared the role of the Christian right in American politics (but less the Christian left). But along comes Joe Lieberman to confuse everything. He talks about his faith, and about how his faith and his understanding of the Bible underlie his liberal policy positions on things like medicare and prescription drug insurance.

Many Jews enjoy his unabashed references to his faith, and his value as a role model for observant Jews. But his statements have made some Jews and the Anti-Defamation League uneasy, and they want him, and all candidates, to tone down their religious rhetoric.

Here is the question: How do we feel about any candidate, anywhere, who admits that his or her values — and their related policy positions — are shaped by their religious faith? Some people, and many Jews, are apparently uncomfortable with this. For some reason, values and policies that are inspired by religiously grounded moral principles are suspect.

Karl Marx or John Stuart Mill or Adam Smith or Ayn Rand is kosher; Jesus or Moses or Mohammed or Buddha is not. But why not? Some people are made uneasy by strong moral convictions — values — of any kind. They think politicians should be making policy based on scientific evidence and objective reason – as if such a thing were ever possible. And if there must be basic values, let them not be "religious." In this perspective, religion and moral principles derived from religion belong strictly to the private sphere, and not the public square.

In fact politicians, and all people who think deeply about these issues, ground their political preferences and policy positions in basic values. Most basic values, if one digs deep enough, have religious roots. Sometimes these remain buried in the subconscious, but often they lie near the surface. There is nothing wrong if a politician like Joe Lieberman admits that some of his convictions are rooted in religious values. Ditto for Christians, whether liberal or conservative.

Basic values are good things to have, and they have to come from somewhere. They should not be kept secret if they are an important guide to public action of our political leaders. This is not an invasion of privacy. It is important to give the voters a complete understanding of their potential leaders.

None of this should lead to religious coercion or a loss of religious freedom. If people agree with the value or policy — increased welfare spending for the poor, or decreased welfare spending for the poor — they do not worry about the religious sources for a politician's view.

In Canada, we have no separation of church and state. Protestants and Catholics enjoy constitutional rights that other religions do not have. Provinces can direct public funds to religious schools, if they so choose. Yet religion has played almost no role in recent national Canadian politics. Stockwell Day has thrown Canadian political observers into a tizzy with his upfront religious pronouncements.

Cosmopolitan elites and pundits, many of whom are likely unchurched, are taken aback by Day's expressions of faith. (They are probably less concerned that the founders of the CCF/NDP were also strongly influenced by Christian commitments.)

There is reason to be careful, should Day's religiosity point toward intolerance for others, or toward the establishment of one religion in Canada. If he moves down that dangerous road, he will pay an electoral price. But on the other hand, we now have an idea about the source of his values and basic convictions.

Jerusalem youth play Toronto

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Albert Piamenta is the bespectacled, bow-tied, gamin Israeli conductor of the the 45-member Jerusalem Youth Band.

The band, made up of kids aged 14 to 18, made their first visit to Toronto and won the affection of an audience of 300 at Beth Habonim Congregation.

From the moment he introduced Ballet Parisien by "Yankele" Offenbach, Piamenta's sense of humour held sway.

After the band showed its prowess with classic Yiddish and Sephardi compositions, plus a selection of popular numbers, Piamenta wondered out loud how a nice Jewish maidela, and a sabra at that, could have a first name like Bambi!

Piamenta was referring to band member, Bambi Ben-Gur, who arranged Inyan Shel Zeman for the band.

He kicked out his legs like a chorus girl during the Offenbach number and convinced a woman from the audience to dance the cha-cha with him to the music of Bright Eyes. He playfully tapped the legs of the many children, who practically sat under his feet, with his baton.

Jerusalem Youth Band in Toronto

The crowd howled its delight when he got Rachel Lasry, a young volunteer, to imitate his conducting technique, including the flourishes to quiet the trombones or bring on the sweet-sounding flutes.

He introduced Duke Ellington's Caravan with his own clarinet solo, adding that Ellington probably didn't realize that he was using a Jewish music scale for Caravan.

Piamenta took over last year from Eitan Avitsuri, who led the band for 13 years. Avitsuri was the guest conductor for Ketsad Merakdim, which was arranged by Piamenta.

"To welcome the young women and men who have walked the streets of Jerusalem and breathed in its air, is indeed an honour," said the congregation's vice-president, Issie Goldman, whose daughter, Elisa, joined the band as a soloist in Jerusalem of Gold and Lo Yisa Goy (Lay Down Your Arms).

Goldman said he hoped the example of tolerance set by the band members, two-thirds of whom are observant, and include olim chadashim, (immigrants to Israel) would be followed by all the people of Israel.

Storyteller Alec Gelcer, elaborated on the central role the city of Jerusalem has played in Jewish life.

Eli Rubenstein, who invited the band to Toronto, later told The CJN, "To see the look on the faces of survivors when they heard the Israeli youngsters from the streets of Jerusalem, in a land that they only dreamed of, made it all worthwhile."

Band members stayed with 25 host families on the weekend, and went sightseeing on Monday.

They performed on City TV's Breakfast TV, and then visited the CN Tower, later splitting up to see downtown malls.

"I think your city is beautiful with its green trees and ponds," said Rochelle Goldstein, an American who made aliyah with her family from Boston.

She is one of 10 Americans with the band who have made aliyah. Jonathon Lenman, a tuba player, is a Canadian citizen.

Some band members visited relatives while they were in Toronto.

"We go to different high schools," said Rochelle. "Yet, we all get along.

"When we graduate we are no longer eligible for the band," she said.

A special fund has been set up to assist those children who come from large families (with four or more children). About 50 percent of band members come from such families, said director Rafi Mahtabi. Proceeds of the sale of the band's first CD at the concert went to the fund.

Parshat Ki Tavo

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

Rabbinic Reflections

The Yafeh To'ar, a classic commentary on the Midrash Rabba written by R'Shmuel Yafeh Ashkenazi (1525-1595, Constantinople) makes the interesting observation that Parshat Ki Tavo is always read the week before Ashkenazi Jewry begins saying Selichot, the penitential prayers which herald the arrival of Rosh Hashanah.

He explains that this parshah contains the Tochacha, Moses' rebuke of the Jewish people who will in the future be punished for falling away from God's law. The Yafeh To'ar suggests that if the Jewish people, God forbid, need to be chastised, the study of this text ought to suffice and hopefully the nation would be spared actual suffering. While this is a comforting homiletical interpretation, Jewish history has all too often confirmed the accuracy of the original dreaded pronouncements expressed so clearly in this section of the Torah.

Yet when we look at the parshah itself, we see that when Moses describes the Tochacha, he provides an explanation for why such misfortune and suffering will befall God's chosen people. The Jews will be subjected to unprecedented hardship and evil, we are told, "because you did not serve the Almighty, your God, with gladness and goodness of heart when everything was abundant." (Devarim 28.47)

It seems, at first, that this is a bizarre rationalization for the horrors described in the Tochacha. We were not "happy enough;" we did not serve God with "sufficient joy" when the opportunity was at hand – this hardly justifies the massive and collective national anguish experienced by the Jewish people due to the afflictions listed in Moses' rebuke.

I believe that the verse ascribing the blame for the Tochacha to a lack of simchah can be understood from a different perspective and be placed within its proper context with the assistance of three additional commentaries quoted below.

In his commentary, entitled Or HaChaim, the famous kabbalist and talmudic scholar, Rav Chaim ben Attar (1696-1743, Livorno, Italy, and subsequently Jerusalem) suggests that people do not take the time or spend the effort necessary to understand God's commandments. Rav Shmuel of Sochachov (1856-1920), in his work Shem M'Shmuel, informs us that the Jews would become indifferent and cold to the performance of the mitzvot. He explains that they want to get their observance of God's commandments over with as quickly and as painlessly as possible. Rav Moshe Sofer, better known as the Chasam Sofer (1762-1839, Rabbi of Pressburg and acknowledged leader of Hungarian Jewry), understands this verse homiletically and says that God's anger is aroused when Israel's failure to serve God is accompanied with gladness and goodness of heart.

In each of these three commentaries, while there is a clear lack of sensitivity to the beauty and the joy of God's commandments there is even greater lack of appreciation for God Himself. There is no sense of gratitude to the Almighty for everything we have achieved; no recognition of the goodness of the blessings that the Almighty has already seen fit to bestow upon us. Although this is always inappropriate behaviour, it is particularly inappropriate as Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur begin to arrive on the horizon.

Perhaps, as the Yafeh To'ar notes, Parshat Ki Tavo is always read the week before Ashkenazi Jewry begins saying Selichot to correlate the Tochacha with the opening of the High Holy Day season. It is not inconceivable that we are to compare and contrast the realities of Moses' rebuke with our hopes and dreams for the new year.

Elul is the time for reflection and taking stock of where we are in our lives as well as where we want to be. Hopefully the self-examination we are to be engaged in at this time will help us develop our potential for goodness so that we can continue to receive God's blessings.

K'tivah v'chatimah tova.

The High Holiday and Tikun Olam

Guest Voice

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are a time when Jews are meditative as individuals, and contemplative as a community. As part of this moment of thought and prayer, one thing which deserves careful consideration is our response to the world around us.

That being said, the question of how did Jewish Toronto respond to such issues as the famine in Ethiopia, the grossly impoverished Jews of the former Soviet Union, and the scourge of HIV/Aids in the world, especially Africa, is inevitable.

The possibilities are endless. In the year 5761, Jews can respond with vigour and protest against the horrifying reality of homeless lying on our streets in a city flowing with great wealth. Others can act to repair the overwhelming pain Canadians inflicted on our own Native Canadian children – our indigenous people.

And still others might want to look sternly at the Jewish community and work toward ensuring love of one Jew for another, or perhaps at the abuse in our Jewish school system.

As Jews, and Canadians living in a chosen and splendid period in history we cannot afford to do otherwise. To do so would be hypocritical and a travesty of our past.

After all, how many times did we read in the Torah this year, "remember we were strangers in a strange land." Consider the countless times we mourned in 5760 over the death of our six million, and the silence in the world as our children, parents and grandparents were humiliated, shot and burned to their deaths.

God, we were so angry at the world's intransigence and its choice to attend the opera rather than protestations against our slaughter.

The Holocaust stands in our history as a blight against our neighbours, at least in part.

Shouldn't our response to the world around us in 5761 be a gauge for our neighbours?

In the year ahead, consider that if the Jews of Canada, no if the Jews of Toronto, were to band together and fight with every inch of their souls against such issues as the lack of a housing policy in our country, or the painfully striking fact that many children in Toronto go to school starving every single day, or the fact that drug companies have placed patent laws ahead of millions of lives in sub-Saharan Africa – we could quite literally save millions of lives.

We Canadian Jews have the capacity to change the world around us in a way which is exciting and hopeful. Just ask those people who fought to unlock the choking doors of sweat factories, or the lawyers and civil rights workers who battled to remove bigotry and anti-Semitism from Toronto's beaches, universities and businesses.

They'll tell you straight, that there was personal sacrifice involved. But in the end, they were victorious.

Margaret Mead, the famous anthropologist said, "Never doubt that a small group of thoughtful committed citizens can change the world: Indeed it's the only thing that ever has."

Our potential to make this world shine, maybe to bring the Messiah, is absolutely imbedded in our Jewish genetics. During the High Holy Days, when you pray and reflect upon your performance in 5760 and your plans as a community member in 5761, consider that for you the world was created, and that which lies in front of us is the glorious chance to fix and shine our shared world – tikun olam.

L'shanah tovah!

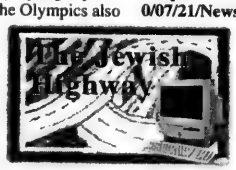
Israel and the Olympics

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This month, the entire world is watching Sydney, Australia, as elite athletes meet to compete in the 27th Olympiad. Although Jewish athletes have shared in past Olympic glory, for Jews, the memory of the Olympics also includes racism, violence and death. Today, a look at that history, courtesy of the World Wide Web.



One of the greatest blots on the history of the Games is Nazi Germany's hosting of the 1936 Summer Olympics. The United States Holocaust Memorial Museum has a comprehensive site detailing the Games starting in 1931 with the International Olympic Committee's awarding of the XIth Olympiad to Berlin [http://www.ushmm.org/olympics/ zindex.htm].

Although Hitler was elated with the Games and Germany's athletes captured the most medals overall, the site points out that 13 Jewish athletes and 10 African-American competitors (including Jesse Owens) were medalists at the Games.

And of course, there was the tragedy of the 1972 Munich Olympics. Eleven members of the Israeli Olympic delegation were murdered by Palestinian terrorists. There are many sites that deal with the massacre. Although the official Olympic site doesn't have any articles specifically about Munich, it does maintain links to several external sites that deal with the killings and their aftermath [http://www.looksmart.com/eus579255/r?l&izrd&]. As for the security in Sydney, the Jerusalem Post reports that although no country will be allowed to provide its own armed security guards, a source suggests an unofficial agreement exempts Israel from the ban [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/07/21/News/News.9934.html].

Despite the media frenzy that always surrounds the Olympics, apparently not everyone has been caught up in the hype. In his essay, Why the Olympic Spirit Lacks a Jewish Neshama, Calgary's Eliezer Segal [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/870901_Olympic.html] suggests that historically, Judaism has looked upon organized athletics at worst as a vicious and cruel pastime and at best as a frivolous pursuit. One notable exception, however, was Israel's first Chief Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook who believed in the importance of maintaining a healthy mind in a healthy body.

Whatever the reason, Israel's athletes have only recently begun to bring home Olympic medals. In Barcelona in 1992, half-middleweight Yael Arad won silver and lightweight Oren Smadga won bronze for judo. And at the Atlanta Olympics in 1996, Gal Friedman won bronze in windsurfing. For more on Israel's Olympic record, check Ellis Shuman's excellent overview [http://israeliculture.about.com/library/weekly /aa073100a.htm].

As for Jewish athletes from outside Israel, no look at the Olympics would be complete without acknowledging the efforts of two of its most famous competitors. The United States' Mark Spitz [http://www.jewishsport.com/profiles.html] was the first athlete to win seven gold medals in a single Olympic Games. Also profiled at the Jewishsport site is Britain's Harold Abrahams who won gold in the 100-metre final at the 1924 Paris Olympics. Abrahams' story is well-known, thanks to the 1981 film Chariots of Fire. You can listen to a rendition of Vangelis' theme of that movie at iMarvel [http: //www.imarvel.com/class6.htm].

If you're not cut out to compete in the 100-metre dash or even a round of beach volleyball, maybe there still is a sport for you. A couple of sites have suggested events in which Jews could perform swifter, higher, stronger. Here are a couple from Stuart Spector: [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Delphi/5655/j0298/j0217.html]

• Naches Shlep: Proud bubbies and zaydehs have two minutes to boast about their grandchildren.

• Balance Beam: The accountant or bookkeeper that balances my mother's checkbook in the shortest amount of time will be declared winner.

And some more events from Ohr Somayach: [http://www.ohr.org.il/judaism/humor/top10/olympics.htm]

• 18 Blessing Lip-Sprint;
• Clean and Jerk Torah Lift;
• Kipah Frisbee; and
• Underwater Shofar Blowing.

Next week, more from Sydney and the Internet – as the Games begin.

Elul and Creation

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

We have begun the month of Elul and with it, preparations for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Prayers begin to reflect our hearts turning toward repentance; and texts for study centre on ethical issues and relationships.

But Elul carries with it significance in its own right, separate from the High Holy Days. In fact, Elul could be seen as a microcosm for the entire world.

The midrashic text of Leviticus Rabbah tells us that creation began on the 25th day of Elul. By this count, humanity was created on what coincides with Rosh Hashanah and since that is the day Adam and Eve sinned, that is the day that all humanity is judged.

But before there was humanity, before there was order imposed onto chaos, the light of creation began on the 25th day of Elul.

Esther Rabbah, another midrashic text tells us that the walls of Jerusalem were completed on the 25th day of Elul. Jerusalem, the centre of Jewish political controversy, past, present and likely future, has a significant event occur to it in the month of Elul.

The 25th of Elul gives us the world and politics. One could almost say the two go hand in hand.

The Mishnah tells us that the first of Elul is the New Year for the animals. The Talmud discusses the significance of this New Year because we are required to tithe the animals. For this purpose, we calculate the age of the animal in relation to the first of Elul.

There is an interesting discussion that takes place that questions why it is Elul that marks this New Year. The rabbis conclude that Elul is the month in which the animals bear their young and hence it is their New Year.

Remembering that the world began on the 25th of Elul, that would place the creation of the animals within the month of Elul as well. Just as Tishrei is the month in which humanity was born, so Elul is the month in which the animals are born.

We are judged and our fate is sealed in the same month that signifies our creation, as are the animals.

Many rabbinic texts speak of how Israel should learn from the animals. We must learn to be ethical, to respect relationships and even how to worship God by observing the animals.

Here too, remembering that the animals have their moment of truth in Elul reminds us that our moment of truth approaches.

Elul signifies the creation of the world. With that world comes political realities that define the human condition. Lest we begin to think ourselves the masters of that world, Elul reminds us again to learn from creation.

The animals will bear their young this month – how many will make it to next Elul?

It warrants a moment of pause as we remember Tishrei is fast approaching.

It's Nobody's Choice... But Your Own.

Nobody can dictate which funeral chapel a family must use. By law, there are no formal or binding agreements between synagogues, burial societies, cemeteries, and funeral chapels.

Deciding on a funeral chapel is an important family decision. The decision is yours; the choice is clear.

'Megillat HaShoah' planned by Conservative Jews

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past eight years, Holocaust survivor Alex Eisen has felt strongly that, despite vast quantities of memorials, museums, books, videos and movies on the Holocaust, something was missing.

Eisen, who is active in numerous causes and was instrumental in building the Holocaust monument in Earl Bales Park, was born in Krakow in 1927. He has made it a personal mission to ensure the creation of a megillah commemorating the Holocaust, intended to be read on Yom HaShoah.

After independently approaching various institutions without securing a commitment, he and Rabbi Philip Scheim took the idea to the Rabbinical Assembly, umbrella organization for 1,600 Conservative rabbis.

The RA, in conjunction with the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, has undertaken the project, which has a working title of Megillat HaShoah.

Holocaust museums and other efforts are "vitally important," says Rabbi Scheim, spiritual leader of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, "but our ultimate commemoration has been through ritual."

In most cases, events have taken up to 1,000 years to become ritualized, noted the rabbi in a recent interview in his synagogue study.

"With respect to the Holocaust, we do not have the luxury of sitting back...We need to take an activist approach to remembering, in a world where some would rather those memories be obliterated, and at a time when living survivors are naturally diminishing in memory."

Rabbi David Golinkin, recently named president of the Schechter Institute, is chairing the committee of scholars and writers working on the project. "It's really a blue-ribbon committee," said Rabbi Scheim.

A recent development, he noted, was the commissioning of prominent Israeli writer Aharon Appelfeld to do the actual writing. "It's being written by a writer who has a poetic style and an appreciation for the Hebrew language," said Rabbi Scheim.

It is hoped that by next Yom Hashoah, a draft will be available, after which traditional trope will be applied so that it can be chanted.

Liturgist Rabbi Jules Harlow will translate the work into English. Spanish, Russian and French versions are also planned.

The parchment scroll will be accompanied by a book with added readings and prayers.

Start-up costs run about $200,000, said Eisen, who is working on raising the funds.

Eisen said he is often asked why there's a need for a megillah. "Anything which is not ritualized, is forgotten," he said. "What do we know what history will bring?"

Although the project will be in the form of a megillah scroll, it is not intended as a new book of the Bible, stressed Rabbi Scheim, noting that "we don't have the right" to add to the Bible.

"Anything published by the Conservative movement has to go through the [Rabbinical Assembly's] committee of laws and standards. Nothing will go against Halachah. We're not going from the five megillot to the six megillot."

The five megillot are Kohelet, which is read on Sukkot; Esther (Purim); Shir HaShirim (Pesach); Ruth (Shavuot); and Eicha (Tisha B'Av).

Although other Holocaust liturgies and Yom HaShoah services have been written, to the best of Rabbi Scheim's knowledge there is nothing widespread and nothing in Hebrew.

He said he hopes the new project will have a broad appeal beyond the Conservative movement.

JVS consultant helps make students' lives easier

Joy Koplowitz

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joy Koplowitz, a psycho-educational consultant with Jewish Vocational Services of Greater Toronto, makes school a little easier for a lot of students.

Koplowitz has been at the agency for 14 years and has a master's degree in assessment and counselling from the Institute of Child Study. She assesses and counsels students, helps them access educational resources, or intervenes when they need modified or special programs.

Assessments are on a fee-per-service basis, and are done at the request of either parents, a day school teacher or principal, or a social service agency such as Jewish Family & Child Service.

"I graduated from the day school system and I understand the concerns of the parents – who are usually the ones that feel the pressure of what their child is undergoing – and the students. When an ESL [English as a second language] student comes in, we can communicate in Hebrew.

"These kids often have trouble adjusting socially because English is not their first language. Talking to them in a language they understand makes things a lot easier for them," she says.

She'll also go into the school and help teachers develop strategies to deal with the student, says Koplowitz.

"I'll work with a remedial team at the child's school to come up with a specific program that is planned around the assessment results. Teachers do not always see what a student is going through. I sometimes find out about problems the teachers do not even know are there. We try to pull all our resources together."

It is easier for her to find a child's strengths, she says, because she works with them one on one. It is a nurturing situation because they get all my attention."Teachers do not usually have this luxury. They have to work in groups, so it might be difficult to perceive each child's needs."

Her work as a principal and teacher at Summit Heights Co-operative Hebrew School, she says, complements what she does at JVS. "It helps me see things from a teacher's perspective. I can understand their frustrations."

It "makes her day," she says, when a child sees her in a school corridor and pulls her aside to tell her about good test results. "Positive outcomes often take some time and a lot of work, but when they do come, it is heartwarming."

CLARIFICATIONS

Since the publication of the article, "Wiesenthal Centre names director of development" (CJN, Aug. 31), the centre has announced changes to one of its programs mentioned in the article. The film premiere of In Search of Peace will now be held on Dec. 4 and the event will be jointly chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Lawrence Bloomberg.

The names of Mary and Ben Rogow, and Mira and Sam Levine, pioneer settlers in the Peterborough area, were inadvertently omitted from the article, "Peterborough Jewish community comes to life," in our Aug. 31 issue. The CJN regrets the error.

Legion branch remembers Jewish veterans

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadians need to become more aware of the role Jewish men and women played in World War II, say members of General Wingate Branch 256, Royal Canadian Legion.

"Of about 168,000 Jews in Canada at the time, over 10 percent of them served in the armed forces. Percentage-wise, that is more than any other ethnic group in Canada," says Al Rubin, public relations officer for the branch, which received official charter from the Royal Canadian Legion in 1934.

"Many of us just don't realize the sacrifice Canadian Jews made during the war. Our Jewish schools have been delinquent in teaching the history and heritage of Canadian Jewish veterans," he says.

"Students learn more about Israeli veterans than they do about Canadian veterans."

The branch's annual memorial service at the Canadian Jewish War Veterans Memorial in Mount Sinai Cemetery, which usually takes place some time between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur – this year it was held Sept. 10 – is one way the branch raises awareness of the veterans, says Murray Jacobs, parade chair.

A cenotaph at the cemetery, which has listed about 428 names of Jewish veterans who died fighting for Canada, was funded by the General Wingate branch about 20 years ago, and is the only one of its kind in the country.

"There are other cenotaphs, but they honour only local Jews. We have names from across the nation," says Sam Romberg, president of the branch, which now has about 200 members. "The service is meaningful to us and to the relatives of people inscribed."

The member's annual poppy campaign held in November raises money to be used for such things as providing assistance to needy ex-servicemen and women and their families, purchasing medical equipment and appliances for community health facilities and building affordable housing for veterans and senior citizens.

The branch also helps support the Sunnybrook Hospital veterans' wing, and five years ago was instrumental in forming the hospital's Jewish chapel, the only one in a veterans' hospital in the country.

Every two weeks for the past 18 years, members have held a program for Jewish veterans at the hospital, and a bingo run by Hilda Harris, wife of one of the veteran residents, is held once a month. They also hold a monthly Shabbat service at the chapel. "The veterans look forward to our visits. Even those who cannot talk have indicated their appreciation," says Romberg.

The branch is in the final stages of developing an archives at the Lipa Green Building, in conjunction with the Canadian Jewish War Veterans. "Included will be artifacts, photos and memorabilia illuminating the people who died for our country," says Bromberg.

General Wingate branch invites siblings, children and grandchildren of veterans to join."We've gotten to the point that as veterans die, we are losing part of our history and heritage," says Oscar Adler, first vice-president of the branch.

"We have to find a way of becoming self-perpetuating – of keeping awareness going after we are all gone. Recruiting younger members will help keep our organization vibrant," he says.

The organization's aim in the next few years, says Rubin, is to make sure that those who "provided exceptional service to Canada are recognized. Educators need to be aware of these people, and talk about them in school. Young people should see that as Jews, we have had tremendous impact on the country."

There is so much history about Canadian Jews that has never been brought forward, says Bromberg. "We want to spark some interest and add to the pride of Canadian Jews."

Book to memorialize Canadian Jewish war dead

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Oscar Adler, Jewish war veteran and membership chair of the Royal Canadian Legion's General Wingate Branch, is racing against time.

By next May, the 56th anniversary of the end of World War II, he hopes to complete an ambitious project: a high-quality memorial book listing the names of every Canadian Jewish serviceman killed in this century's wars.

Adler started the project about five years ago when he realized there wasn't a single memorial book for the roughly 570 Jewish soldiers, sailors and airmen who died in battle for Canada this century.

"It all started when I met a woman named Rose Fluxgold, and she asked me, 'When I'm gone, who's going to remember my brothers?'" Adler recalled for The CJN. "Two of her brothers were killed in World War II: Zavi Brown and Syd Brown."

Adler set up the Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association, got a federal tax number to issue receipts, and began collecting money and names.

He also pitched his idea to over 800 Jewish war veterans across Canada. Over the years, he's collected $41,000 for the project from donors as far as Yukon and Newfoundland.

But the memorial book he envisions – printed on acid-free paper and with names, ranks, places of birth and dates of death inscribed in calligraphy – will cost $70,000.

So Adler is on a public fund-raising campaign, as well as a search for volunteers who will help comb through the three boxes of documents he's received from the archives of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The purpose of this project is to record what Canadian Jews did for this century's war efforts. It's a legacy we're trying to leave," says Adler, 75, a onetime leading aircraftsman in the Royal Canadian Air Force.

He points out that over 4,000 Jews served in World War I and about 18,000 in World War II.

The memorial book will contain all the names of Canadian Jews who died in the Boer War (there's no record of the number of Jewish dead); World War I (150 dead); World War II (between 422 and 428 killed); and the Korean conflict (as far as Adler knows, one Jewish soldier fell in that war, an infantryman named Leveson). The book will also leave room – to stay blank, Adler hopes – for any Jewish Canadian Forces members killed while on United Nations peacekeeping missions.

Most Jewish servicemen killed in Europe are buried in France, Belgium, Holland and Italy. Many have no graves at all, Adler says.

The only comparable volume to Adler's project is a photocopied book of Jewish casualties in World War II, published by Canadian Jewish Congress in 1948.

Adler says he's received the cold shoulder from established Jewish organizations when it comes to money. All donations thus far have come from individual war veterans and some philanthropists. He's also been turned down for government grants.

Adler needs people with computer skills to create a database, as well as any information from next of kin or other loved ones on Jewish servicemen killed in action.

"A copy of this book should go wherever there's a Jewish presence in Canada," he says.

Adler may be reached at 416-225-4276.

Cantor Kowarsky marks 20 years at Beth Tzedec

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Any cantor who has not changed his approach in recent years is a fool, says Cantor Paul Kowarsky bluntly.

An unabashed traditionalist, the 57-year-old cantor – who is being honoured this Shabbat on his 20th anniversary as cantor of Beth Tzedec Congregation – has incorporated new, "singable" tunes into his cantorial repertoire with the precise approach one might expect from a lawyer, interweaving new melodies with old and ensuring that the new ones are solidly rooted in traditional modes.

In fact, Cantor Kowarsky practised law before immigrating to Canada from South Africa in 1976. A qualified cantor from the time he was in his late teens, he juggled University of South Africa law school correspondence courses with his duties as a chazzan in Johannesburg before becoming a full-time lawyer.

He gave it all up as a young father of three to take his family away from political chaos in South Africa.

Cantor Paul Kowarsky

Although he loves chazzanut, Cantor Kowarsky said in a recent interview in his Beth Tzedec office, he very much missed law after he became cantor at Montreal's Beth Ora Congregation in 1976, and sought freelance work for a while to ease the transition. Before joining Beth Tzedec, he spent two years at a traditional Conservative congregation in Cincinnati.

"It's been great for me," the cantor said of his two decades at Beth Tzedec, the largest Conservative congregation in North America. "I think I've been able to develop beyond what I ever would have in a smaller congregation."

A spinto tenor – the same vocal category as Luciano Pavarotti – Cantor Kowarsky continues to work on his vocal technique with lyric tenor Mark Dubois.

The ability "to make people feel good, whether in their relationship with God, the synagogue or themselves – and whether through singing or my interaction with them" is the most satisfying aspect of his career.

A six-month sabbatical that ended in April was satisfying in a different way for Cantor Kowarsky. He travelled to Europe, Australia and New Zealand, taking opportunities to sing as they presented themselves, and learning about different Jewish communities. "It was beyond anything I could ever have dreamt," he said.

Especially significant was his trip to Vilna, Lithuania, the birthplace of his late father Herman, an actor in Yiddish theatre who died shortly before his son became a synagogue choir soloist at age nine. "It was a very painful thing," he said.

Unlike the cantor's mother Rose, who is now 97 and living in Toronto, his father never heard him sing, he said, "and singing has been my whole life."

Of the cantor's five children, only Glen, his second, followed in his footsteps as a cantor. He has since left the field, but the Kowarskys are definitely a musical family. The cantor's 20-year-old twins, Dan and Ryan, make up two thirds of the pop group b4-4, and their sister, Kim Kowarsky Doron, is also a singer. Daughter Laura is in early childhood education.

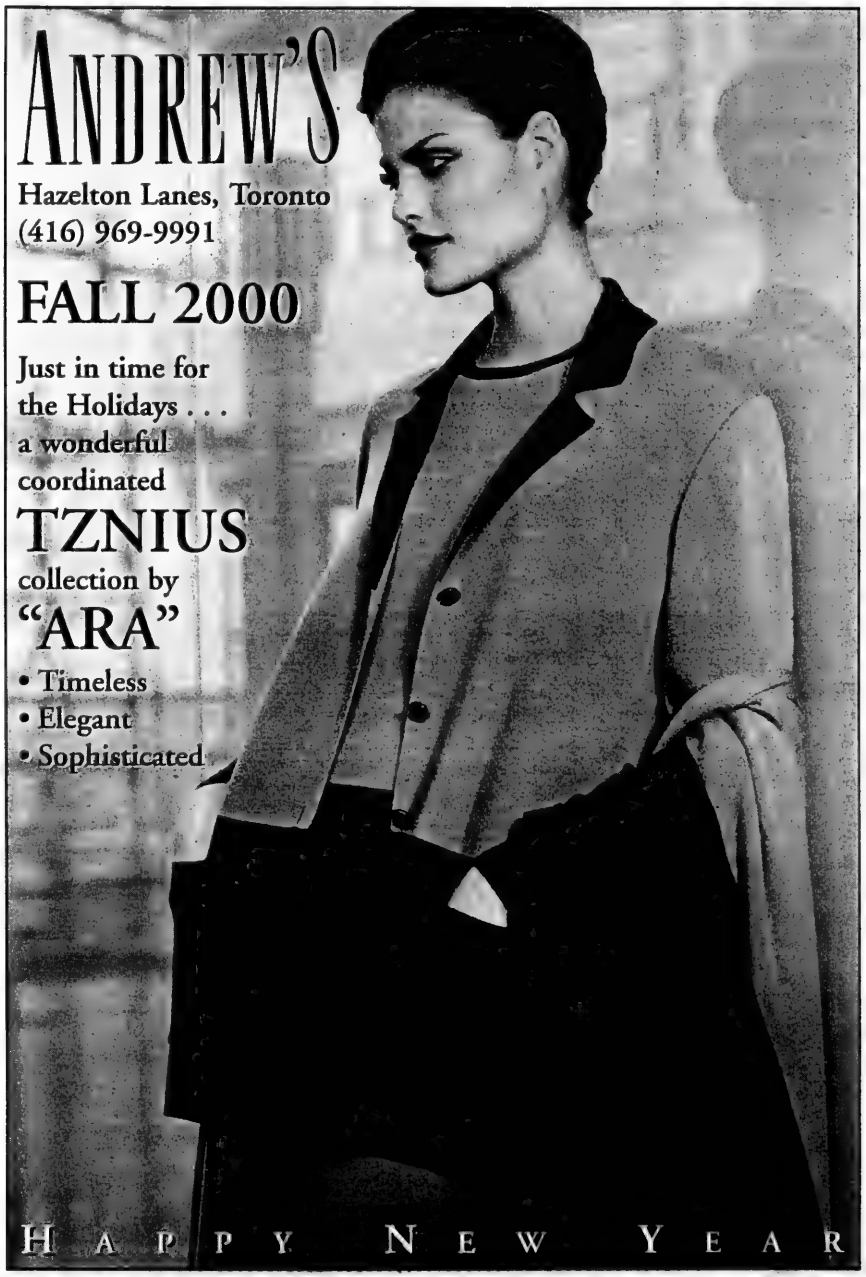
The role of women at religious services is an issue the cantor has had to deal with. He is not in favour of women's aliyot, which are permitted at Beth Tzedec, but has accepted them, he said. He would be "totally opposed" to such a change if it were effected across the board because he believes it is important for traditional Judaism to remain intact if the religion is to survive.

Cantor Kowarsky discouraged his son from becoming a cantor, because the cantorate is changing, he said. There is not one full-time Orthodox cantor in Toronto, and very few in Europe, he noted.

"The free traditional interpretation of the text through cantorial music has gone by the board," he said. "The pathos and emotion that was infused into the davening through the cantor's free chant...is not understood today."

Today, he said, speaking generally, congregants want to sing along, there is less concern about whether the music is appropriate to the words, and for some, what is expected of the cantor's voice is "a minor detail."

The changes are not all bad, Cantor Kowarsky says. What would be "a great loss," he believes, would be the loss of the traditional chants and modes that are unique to Jewish music.



Holiday Food Ideas

Shanah Tovah from the staff at The CJN

As we prepare for the High Holy Days, life for many of us becomes more hectic. Between choosing menus, inviting guests and preparing some of the food ahead of time, we often lose sight of the true meaning of the holidays.

The holiday period should be a time of introspection – of looking back at the past year and thinking about the year to come.

As well, it should be a time to bask in the joy of being surrounded by family and friends, and to take a moment to cherish the memory of those who, although not here physically, are spiritually with us throughout the holidays.

At The CJN, we are trying to make life a little bit easier during the yamim tovim. We will, in the coming weeks, present recipes intended to strike a chord in all of us, whether we want recipes to be quick and easy, have vegetarians at our holiday table or are preparing a yom tov meal for the first time.

We would like you to enjoy your yom tov, indulge in some honey cake after synagogue services, and be content that everything is organized at home for your holiday celebration.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you Shanah Tovah.

A variety of recipes to savour all year round

BY EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Here are some recipes you can share with friends and family at holiday time and all year round.

CHALLAH

9 cups flour, divided
1¼ cups sugar
3 packages of dry yeast
1 tbsp. salt
2½ cups lukewarm water
½ cup oil
4 eggs at room temperature
Beaten egg and poppy or sesame seeds

In a large bowl, combine 2½ cups flour, sugar, yeast, salt, water, and oil. Mix well. Add the eggs and 1½ cups flour. Mix well. Add remaining flour, one cup at a time. Mix in between each cup of flour. Knead well.

Place dough in a greased bowl and let rise, covered with a towel, for 2 to 2½ hours. Divide dough and braid into three large or five small challahs. Place on cookie sheet and let rise for 15 minutes. Brush top of challah with beaten egg and sprinkle either poppy seeds or sesame seeds on top of the egg. Bake at 350 for 30 minutes.

SMOKED WHITEFISH SPREAD

8-oz. pkg. cream cheese
½ lb. smoked whitefish
2 tbsp green onions, finely chopped
1 tbsp fresh dill, finely chopped
⅛ tsp. freshly ground pepper

Place all ingredients in a food processor or electric mixing bowl and combine together until well blended. Place mixture in a glass bowl, cover and refrigerate for at least 1 hour.

CHICKEN SOUP

1 medium fryer, cut-up
10 cups cold water
2 stalks celery with leaves
1 onion, quartered
5 black peppercorns
6 sprigs parsley
Salt
Pepper parsley, chopped
Carrot, slivered

Put the cut-up chicken into a stockpot (or other large, heavy pot). Cover with cold water. Cut the celery into pieces and add to the pot along with the onion, peppercorns and parsley sprigs. Bring to a boil. Reduce heat and skim the foam that has accumulated from the top. Half cover the pot and simmer for 90 minutes. Cool slightly. Remove the chicken and strain the broth. Add salt and pepper to taste. Remove the chicken meat from the bones and chop.

Add as much of the chopped chicken to the broth as you wish. Serve garnished with chopped parsley and slivered carrot. Makes approx. 8 cups.

BEEF BARLEY SOUP

½ cup uncooked barley
4 cups water, or vegetable, beef stock
1 large bay leaf
2 carrots, sliced
1 small parsnip, sliced
½ cup chopped onion
1½ tsp chopped garlic
1 tbsp vegetable oil
½ lb. mushrooms, sliced
½ tsp dried thyme
1 tbsp soy sauce
white pepper to taste
½ cup chopped parsley
Salt to taste

In a large stockpot, combine barley, stock and bay leaf. Simmer about 1 hour or until barley is tender. Add carrots and parsnip; simmer for 15 minutes. Add onions, garlic, mushrooms, thyme, soy sauce and pepper; bring to a boil for 5 minutes. Remove bay leaf. Serve sprinkled with parsley. You can add a few short ribs to the stockpot when you're combining the barley and stock. This will make a more full-bodied soup. Serves 4 to 6.

SPLIT PEA SOUP

6 cups water
2 cups dried split peas
2 medium carrots, peeled and sliced
¼ cup red pepper, chopped

Holiday Food Ideas

Recipes for all year round

1 large onion, coarsely chopped
4 or 5 short ribs with meat
1/8 tsp. ground black pepper

Bring water to boil in a 4 quart pot. Add peas, onion, carrots, red pepper and meat to the pot and return to a boil. Reduce heat to medium, stir in black pepper, and cook uncovered for 1 1/2 hours or until meat is tender. Remove meat from the soup. When it is cool enough to handle, cut the meat into bite-sized pieces and return to soup. Ladle soup into individual bowls. Serve hot.

Note: you can leave out the meat. Serves 8.

MATZAH BALLS

2 tbsp. oil
1 egg, slightly beaten
1 tsp. salt
1 cup matzah meal
1 cup boiling water
Pepper and nutmeg to taste
1/2 tsp. chopped parsley

Put matzah meal into a bowl and pour the boiling water over it. Stir the mixture until liquid is absorbed and add the oil and then the egg and seasoning. Mix well and chill for one hour or longer.

Make balls the size of a walnut, greasing palms of hands or moistening with cold water occasionally if sticky. Drop matzah balls into boiling soup 15 minutes before serving.

You can make the matzah balls ahead of time and cook them in boiling water. When you remove them from boiling water use a slotted spoon and place them on a cookie sheet and then freeze them. Once frozen, place them in a plastic bag and keep them frozen until needed. This recipe can be doubled or tripled. Makes 8 servings.

STUFFED CABBAGE

1 1/2 cups sugar
2 large yellow onions
1 can tomato sauce
1 tbsp. lemon juice or 2 cubes sour salt
2 lb. ground beef or ground turkey
1/2 cup raw rice
1 head cabbage, large size
1/2 cup raisins
Salt and pepper
Toothpicks

Parboil the cabbage until leaves can be removed without tearing. Place brown sugar in skillet on low flame and add the onions, tomato sauce and lemon juice or sour salt; stir together. Remove from heat and set aside.

In a bowl, combine the meat, salt, pepper and rice. Add a few tsp. of sauce to meat mixture and mix well. Place about 1 tbsp. of meat mixture on each cabbage leaf and roll up. Secure the ends with toothpicks. Add loose cabbage to the bottom of the pot. Place rolls in pot on top of loose cabbage and cover with remaining sauce. Cover pot and simmer for several hours. Longer cooking improves flavour. Add raisins and a little water the last hour of cooking.

Sometimes I keep a bowl of hot water nearby and if the cabbage leaves need more softening, I dip them for another minute.

POTATO KNISHES

I buy the frozen puff pastry dough, roll out thin, cut into 2-3-in. squares, and fill with the following potato mixture:

4 potatoes, boiled with skins on
1 large onion chopped and sauteed
2 eggs
Salt
Pepper
Garlic powder
Parsley
2 tbsp. margarine

Boil potatoes until tender. Cool and remove skins. Place potatoes in a bowl and mash. Add eggs, onions, seasonings and margarine to the potatoes. Mix until smooth and well blended. Place one well-rounded tsp. on each square of dough and bring edges of dough together until sealed in a triangle shape. Place on greased cookie sheet. Brush the top of the triangle with egg white if desired. You can also sprinkle poppy seeds on top before baking. Bake at 400 for 20 to 25 minutes or until golden brown. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

CARROT AND SWEET POTATO TZIMMES

2 lb. baby carrots
6 large sweet potatoes, peeled and quartered
1/2 cup pitted prunes
1 cup orange juice

Bubbe's Kitchen chock full of traditional recipes

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Are you looking for old traditional Jewish recipes that Bubbie used to make? Do you need something new and interesting for the High Holy Days, without all the schmaltz that usually accompanied Bubbie's dishes? Welcome to the tastes and smells of Bubbe's Kitchen (Raincoast Books, 368 pages, trade paperback, $29.95).

This is the seventh collection of more than 300 cherished recipes from the National Council of Jewish Women, Vancouver Section. Co-chairs Karen Rabinovitch and Barbara Lever worked with dozens of volunteers, including longtime member Sue Abramson, who has enough stamina to shame those half her age. Sue was also involved in the production of most of the previous editions.

The volunteers collected many new recipes and also searched through previous editions of Council cookbooks to choose the finest of the old recipes from 1929 to today. Selection was based on simplicity, health concerns, general appeal and Jewish content. The committee discovered that many new favourites are really old favourites with a new twist.

Included is a Sephardi section – recipes from Jews whose origins are in Spain and North Africa. This book makes a great addition to any cookbook collection. Easy to follow kosher recipes, interesting tips, stories about Jewish cooking of the past, a glossary of Jewish expressions, plus holiday recipes are what makes this book such a delight.

You'll find recipes for dishes that have been handed down from generation to generation, including varenikas, knishes, latkes, cabbage rolls and brisket. There are also recipes for new additions to the Jewish culinary repertoire, such as pita chips, pumpkin-filled knishes, fruit and rice cabbage rolls and much more.

I wish you all a sweet and healthy New Year. Enjoy!

SONNY'S TURKEY

This scrumptious recipe was made by Sonny Rabiner, whose family ran a resort hotel in Ste. Agathe des Monts, Quebec, from the 1940s to the 1970s. As a young man and newlywed, Sonny cooked during the summers at Rabiner's, where he learned wonderful Jewish cooking from his grandmother and mother. Years later, when he brought his family to Vancouver, he continued with his first love – cooking.

10-12 lb. turkey, wiped clean with a wet paper towel
2-4 tbsp. vegetable oil
Salt and pepper
3-4 onions, diced
4-6 carrots, diced
4 juicy oranges, squeezed
1 cup dry white wine
3-4 cloves garlic, chopped or sliced
1 large onion, peeled (or 1 large apple, unpeeled)

Rub the outside of the turkey with oil, salt and pepper. Sprinkle the onions, carrots and garlic over the bottom of a roasting pan in order to keep the breast meat moist. Place the bird breast side down on top of the vegetables. Pour the orange juice and wine over top. Roast unstuffed, or stuff with your own favourite stuffing (or see below). Close the cavity with the onion or apple. Cover turkey loosely with parchment paper and roast in oven at 325. Baste once every hour. Turn bird over to brown the breast for the last 30 minutes.

Unstuffed 10 to 12-lb., turkey will take 3 to 3¼ hours. If stuffed, it will take 3½ to 3¾ hours.

Unstuffed 16 to 20-lb. turkey will take 3½ to 4 hours. If stuffed, it will take 4 to 4½ hours.

To check if the turkey is done, jiggle a leg. If it moves easily, the bird should be done. The juice should run clear, not pink. A more scientific method is to insert a meat thermometer in the inner thigh; when it reads 185F/85C, it is done. Whichever method you choose, start checking on the bird about 1 hour before the expected completion time; every bird is different.

CELERY AND MUSHROOM STUFFING

6 cups day-old bread, cubed
¼ cup vegetable oil
1 cup finely chopped onion
1 cup finely chopped celery
1 cup sliced fresh mushrooms
1 cup boiling water
1½ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. pepper
1 tsp. poultry seasoning
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley

Place bread cubes in a bowl. In a fry pan, heat oil and saute onion, celery and mushrooms for 5 minutes. Mix into bread. Add remaining ingredients and mix well.

Variation: Add ¼ to ½ cup of any of the following: slivered almonds, hazelnuts, pine nuts, chopped apple, raisins or currants.

COUSCOUS

In the home of Miriam and Solomon Bennarosh, couscous is eaten on special occasions, as was the custom with most families in Tangier. It is always the traditional meal on the first day of Rosh Hashanah and on the first day of Sukkot.

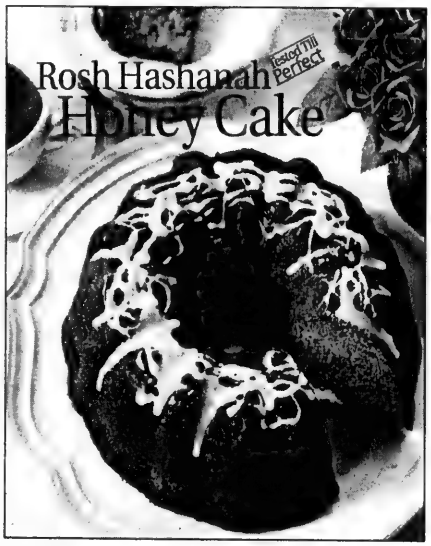
2 lbs. couscous (semolina)
1 cup water
½ cup dried chick-peas, soaked overnight
6 carrots, cut up
1 onion, cut up
½ small pumpkin, cut up in chunks
Salt and pepper to taste
Turmeric to taste
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup granulated sugar

The most important item for making authentic Moroccan couscous is the double-decker steaming pot. Place couscous and 1 cup water in the upper section of steaming pot and seal. Place water in the lower part, and steam for 30 minutes.

Drain soaked chick-peas. In a pot, combine chick-peas, vegetables and pumpkin. Add water to cover and simmer together for 2 hours. Add salt, pepper and turmeric. Mix together cinnamon and sugar. Set aside.

To serve, place couscous on the plate first, then pour vegetable mixture over top. Sprinkle with the sugar and cinnamon dressing.

Variation: Bake the pumpkin glazed with honey and cinnamon, then add to couscous and other vegetables.



PRIZE-WINNING BUDGET HONEY CAKE (PAREVE)

This recipe first appeared in the 1953 cookbook. There have been numerous requests to reprint it ever since.

2 eggs
1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup dark honey
½ cup vegetable oil
2½ cups all-purpose flour
Grated rind of 1 orange or 1 tsp. lemon extract
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg
¼ tsp. cloves
½ tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. baking powder
1 cup cold tea, coffee, fruit juice or mixed liquid
½ cup walnut pieces, optional

Beat eggs and sugar until light; add honey and oil and mix well. Sift dry ingredients and add to egg mixture alternately with liquid, mixing well. Stir in walnut pieces. Lightly oil and flour a 12 x 10 inch cake pan or 2 single loaf pans.

Pour in batter and bake at 325 for 45 minutes to 1 hour. Invert pan(s) on cake rack and let stand until cool.

Stress free Rosh Hashanah dinner should be goal, says food expert

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rosh Hashanah is not the time to become stressed about preparing dinner, says local food expert Lucy Waverman.

"Hosts do not have to feel that they have slaved in the kitchen in order to serve a holiday meal to their family or friends," says Waverman, a food columnist for the Globe & Mail; food editor of Food & Drink, a magazine produced by the LCBO; a regular contributor to CityTV's Cityline; and cookbook author.

"The main course and potatoes do not usually take a lot of preparation time, but such side dishes as vegetables or chopped liver can certainly be bought prepared.

"The presentation can make it look special. Top the liver with parsley or grated egg and the whole dish looks great. If you are not confident about making chopped liver, why worry about it?"

Lucy Waverman

Organization is another key to a stress-free holiday, she says. "Plan to make only one main course – one that most of the family likes – and try to make it early. Dessert can also be made ahead, but if you want to buy it, don't hesitate. You do not have to limit yourself to a bakery – caterers provide all kinds of desserts.

"Make a list of what needs to be done, and what you need to buy. That list is essential to stay organized. You can set the table up to two days ahead, and that frees you to take care of other last-minute tasks."

The following recipes are from Waverman's book, Dinner Tonight (Random House).

VINEYARD CHICKEN

This method of cooking chicken produces a juicy golden bird with a marvelous sauce.

1 3-pound chicken
Salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 tbsp. pareve margarine
1 cup sliced onion
½ cup sliced carrots
1 tbsp. chopped fresh tarragon or 1 tsp. dried
8 oz. red grapes, halved and seeded

Preheat oven to 400. Season chicken with salt and pepper. Heat margarine in ovenproof casserole on medium heat and brown breast side down until golden, about 3 minutes. Turn and brown on all sides, about 3 minutes per side. Remove chicken and drain off all but 1 tbsp. fat.

Add onion and carrot to casserole and saute for 1 minute. Add tarragon and grapes. Return chicken to pan breast side up. Cover and bake for 55 minutes, basting occasionally.

Remove chicken from pan to carving board and cover with tea towel to keep warm. Skim fat from casserole. Scrape contents of casserole into food processor. Process until smooth. Return to pan, bring to boil and simmer for 1 minute or until flavours are combined (if sauce is too thick, thin with a little sauce or water). Season with salt and pepper.

Carve chicken and serve with sauce. Garnish with extra grapes.

ROASTED SWEET POTATOES

4 sweet potatoes
¼ cup olive oil
4 cloves garlic, sliced
12 fresh sage leaves or 1 tsp. dried
Salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 400. Peel sweet potatoes and cut lengthwise into 3 or 4 slices. Combine oil, garlic and sage in bowl. Add sweet potatoes and toss. Season with salt and pepper. Place sweet potatoes in roasting pan and bake for 45 minutes, turning occasionally. They should be soft on the inside and crispy outside.

REALLY ROASTED POTATOES

3 lb. Yukon gold or baking potatoes
⅓ cup olive oil
2 tsp. dried rosemary
Salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 400. Cut potatoes in half. If they are large, cut in half again. Place potatoes in pot and cover with cold water. Bring to boil and simmer for 7 minutes. Drain well. Return to pot and shake over turned-off burner to dry and rough up exterior.

Pour oil into roasting pan large enough to hold potatoes in one layer. Heat oil in oven or on top of stove until hot. Add potatoes to pan and turn until coated with oil. Sprinkle with rosemary, salt and pepper. Roast for about 1 hour, turning occasionally, until crisp and golden.

Kashruth Council cooks up some ideas for the holidays

To help celebrate the holidays, the Kashruth Council of Toronto has prepared the following recipes:

CABBAGE BORSCHT

Cook 2 or 3 days before for improved flavour.

2 lbs. flanken or brisket
1 marrowbone
1 sugar bone
6 cups water
2 onions, finally chopped
2 tins stewed Italian tomatoes (19 oz. each)
1 cup brown sugar
½ tsp. pepper
1 cabbage, coarsely shredded
2 tsp. coarse salt
Juice of 2 lemons
½ cup tomato paste
½ cup sultana raisins (optional)

Combine meat, bones and water in a deep soup pot. Bring to a boil, then skim. Add onions, tomatoes, sugar and pepper. Cover and simmer for 1 hour.

Place shredded cabbage in colander and sprinkle with salt. Pour boiling water over salted cabbage. (This takes away the strong cabbage flavour.) Drain well. Add to soup.

Cover and simmer for 1 hour. Stir in lemon juice and tomato paste. Add raisins (if desired). Cover and simmer 20 minutes longer to blend the flavours. Remove bones. Serve as is or with a boiled potato. The meat can be served as a simple main dish.Before serving, remove the solidified fat and reheat. Freezes well. If soup is too thick, add a little water. Serves 10-12.

MUSHROOM SALAD

2 tsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. kosher white wine
1 lb. button mushrooms

Do not wash or peel mushrooms. Wipe with a damp cloth to clean. Heat oil and wine in a heavy pot. Add mushrooms and cook, stirring over medium heat until tender (about 5-6 minutes). Drain liquid. Save for dressing. Place mushrooms in a serving bowl and set aside to cool. Serves 6.

Dressing:
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tsp. honey
2 tsp. Dijon style mustard
1 tsp. kosher white wine
1 tsp. white vinegar

Place all ingredients in a screw top jar and shake well. Add drained liquid from the mushrooms and stir into the dressing. Pour over mushrooms and mix gently. Garnish with chopped flat leaf parsley and serve at room temperature.

ROAST DUCKLING WITH KASHA/FRUIT STUFFING AND ORANGE SAUCE

2 4-5-lb. ducklings
Salt and pepper
2 onions, sliced
2 oranges with rind, sliced

Wash ducklings well and pat dry. Rub the cavities and outsides of the birds with salt and pepper.

Kasha Stuffing:
1 egg
1½ cups medium kasha
3 cups water or chicken stock
1 tsp. salt
1 medium onion, finely chopped
1 celery stalk, finely chopped
1 apple, peeled and finely chopped
¼ cup finely cut dried apricots
¼ cup finely cut dried prunes (optional)
¼ cup golden raisins
¼ tsp. ginger (optional)
¼ tsp. dry mustard
1 10-oz. can Mandarin orange segments, well drained

Beat egg into dry kasha. Cook on low heat, stirring constantly until mixture dries. Add water or stock. Cover and cook until liquid is absorbed. Add remaining ingredients. Mix well. Preheat oven to 375.

Lightly stuff ducklings with kasha mixture. Truss each duckling. Prick the skin at wings, back and breast to allow excess fat to escape. Place ducklings side by side, breast side up, on rack in shallow roasting pan. Arrange sliced onions and sliced oranges over ducklings. Roast uncovered, for 1 hour. Prick skin to allow more fat to drip off. Turn over to brown on other side. Roast for 1 hour longer, turning to brown evenly on all sides. Baste with orange sauce the last 10-15 minutes of roasting time. Garnish with parsley and orange slices dipped in orange sauce.

Orange Sauce:
3 tbsp. olive oil
4 tbsp. honey (buckwheat is nice)
Grated zest of 1 orange and 1 lemon
1 tsp. ground ginger (optional)
4 tbsp. orange juice
½ tsp. allspice
1 tbsp. paprika
2 oranges, sliced, for garnishing

Mix all ingredients together in a saucepan, except the orange slices. Heat to just boiling. Dip the orange slices in the sauce. Set aside. Baste ducklings with remaining sauce for the last 10-15 minutes of roasting time. Garnish with orange slices. Serves 6.

ORANGE APPLE HONEY CAKE (PAREVE)

See notes below before preparing cake mixture.

1 tsp. baking soda
1 cup strong tea (2 tea bags) or coffee (4 tsp. instant coffee to 1 cup boiling water)
3½ cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg and/or ⅛ tsp. cloves and/or ⅛ tsp. allspice
4 eggs
1 cup sugar
½ cup oil
1 16-oz. jar liquid honey
1 orange, rind and all, remove seeds
1 apple, peeled and cored (Grind orange and apple in blender or food processor until fine)
1 cup raisins (see note)
½ cup almonds, toasted and slivered (optional)

Preheat oven to 325.

Add baking soda to tea or coffee solution. Let stand. Sift together all the dry ingredients, except sugar.

Beat eggs until light and lemon coloured. Add sugar gradually and beat until thick. Add oil, honey, tea or coffee. Mix on medium speed in electric mixer for 7 to 10 minutes. Add ground orange and apple mixture. Fold in sifted dry ingredients. Sprinkle in the raisins and nuts.

Pour into greased 10-inch pan or 12-cup Bundt pan. Bake for 1 hour and 15 minutes or until done. Cool before removing from pan.

Notes:

Honey: Store in tightly covered container in a dark, cool place at room temperature.

Lemony bass proves fish isn't just for Passover

BY LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Fish at Rosh Hashanah? asked a friend when I suggested bringing poached striped bass to her house for a New Year's celebration. "Isn't fish for Passover?"

Until marrying into a family from Trieste, Italy, I believed the same thing. But my husband soon introduced me to a lemony bass, a traditional appetizer enjoyed in Italy during both Passover and Rosh Hashanah.

There are historical and religious reasons to serve fish at holidays throughout the year – especially this Rosh Hashanah, which begins on a Friday night.

"It would be a double mitzvah to have fish this Rosh Hashanah," says Rabbi – and chef – Gil Marks, author of The World of Jewish Entertaining (Simon and Schuster, 1998).

Both Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews customarily ate fish on Shabbat and other holidays because it is a good omen to fulfil the commandment to Abraham "to be fruitful and multiply" like the fish in the sea.

Rosh Hashanah in particular is concerned with fertility and prosperity in the coming year, explains Rabbi Marks.

For this reason, fish and foods bearing seeds are excellent choices on menus. And because it symbolizes fertility, fish reminds us of the creation of life.

Rabbi Marks describes the ancient custom of displaying the head of a fish on the Rosh Hashanah table. It was a sign for the coming year to be the rosh, meaning head, to progress or move ahead.

"The Talmud mentions fish as a Sabbath food at all three meals," he says. It also indicates that separating the flesh of fish from its bones is considered work, which explains in part the popularity of gefilte fish among Ashkenazi Jews and the many recipes calling for chopped fish or fillets in Sephardi cuisine.

In many countries, fish is a staple item at Rosh Hashanah celebrations. Alsatian Jews dine on sweet and sour carp, and German Jews savour a similar dish flavoured with ginger snaps. Indian Jews flavour fish with curry, or wrap fillets in lettuce leaves. Turkish and Greek Jews simmer their holiday fish in sauces made from tomatoes, greengage plums or prunes.

"Among Egyptian Jews, bellahat," or ground fish with tomato and cumin, "is known as a Rosh Hashanah dish," says food writer Jayne Cohen, author of The Gefilte Variations (Simon and Schuster, 2000).

Requiring no poaching in broth, these fish balls are so easily prepared that her 15-year-old daughter often makes them. Given the recipe by Corinne Rossabi, an excellent home cook raised in Egypt, Cohen calls it a spicy alternative to gefilte fish.

"One thing I look forward to at Rosh Hashanah is shopping for ingredients for bellahat at my local greenmarket," she says. Made with a riot of tomatoes, the dish is in sync with Rosh Hashanah's affinity for produce loaded with seeds as part of the holiday's symbolism of fertility and abundance.

For people who prefer gefilte fish but seek a trendy twist on tradition, the salmon gefilte fish recipe below is subtle and light. Marks received it from Bertha Sherman of Portland, Ore. While preparation is easier than advertised, you can cut a step by asking the market to chop the fish.

If you are short on time or don't want to sink your hands into ground fillets, fish can still grace your Rosh Hashanah table.

"I'll tell you how to doctor store-bought gefilte fish," says a travel agent from Highland Park, N.J. Her secret: Simmering the contents of a jar with fresh fillets, carrots, celery and onion. "Believe me, my gefilte fish smells and tastes like homemade." As good as bubbie's? Well, almost.

Of course there is another alternative for people willing to pay the price of convenience, one in accordance with Rosh Hashanah's themes of fertility, prosperity and abundance.

"Although I've never seen it, caviar might be an interesting custom to start at Rosh Hashanah," says Rabbi Marks, with a chuckle. "Why not?"

With prolonged storage, the honey may crystallize. Should this occur, place the jar of honey in a bowl of warm to hot water until the crystals melt. Before measuring honey, oil the inside of the measuring cup or spoon. The honey will pour easily leaving no residue. Wipe the rim of the honey jar with a damp cloth every time you pour from it. The lid will never stick. To prevent burning, honey cakes should always be baked at a slightly lower temperature than cakes containing only sugar.

Raisins: Plumping raisins – Cover with water in a saucepan and bring to a boil. Remove from heat, let stand 5 minutes. Drain well. (Save liquid to make tea or coffee solution for cake.)

Sinking: The popular belief to prevent raisins from sinking to the bottom of the cake is to coat them with flour, but the raisins sink in a honey cake because they are heavy and the batter is thin and light. Raisins can be frozen and cut into pieces before adding to the batter.

Nuts: Before adding nuts to cake, heat them in a 350-degree oven for about 7 minutes and they won't be as likely to sink. It is easier to shred or slice nuts when they are warm. To store shelled nuts, place in a covered container in the refrigerator; they will keep for about 3 months. Or freeze them in a jar, and they will keep indefinitely.

Fish isn't just for Passover

1 tsp. kosher salt
½ tsp. ground cumin
¼ tsp. cayenne
Olive oil for frying

Sauce:
2 cups canned whole tomatoes with their juice, seeded and chopped
2 tbsp. olive oil
Juice of 1 large lemon
Salt and pepper
Soft-leafed lettuce, chopped parsley or cilantro, and lemon quarters for garnish

Cut the fish into 1-inch pieces. In a food processor, puree them with matzah meal, eggs, garlic, salt, cumin and cayenne until mixture is smooth. Transfer the puree to a large bowl and refrigerate it covered for one hour.

With moistened hands, shape the mixture into 16 slightly flattened logs, using a scant ¼ cup for each. Transfer them as they are formed to a sheet of wax paper. Heat ¼ inch of oil over high heat in a large, heavy skillet until it is hot but not smoking. Add the fish balls in batches and fry, turning them once until pale golden. Transfer balls to paper towels.

Wipe out the skillet. Add the tomatoes and their juice, olive oil, lemon juice and salt and pepper to taste. Cook over high heat for 8 to 10 minutes, stirring occasionally, until the tomatoes break up and the sauce is thickened.

Add the fish balls and simmer the mixture over low heat, covered, for 15 minutes, turning fish balls once or twice.

Remove the skillet from the heat and allow fish to cool in sauce. Line a platter with lettuce. Arrange fish balls on them, and spoon sauce over fish. Sprinkle with parsley or cilantro, and accompany with lemon wedges. Serve the fish chilled or at room temperature. Yield: About 8 servings.

SALMON GEFILTE FISH

Adapted from The World of Jewish Entertaining by Gil Marks.

Stock:
2 quarts cold water
Fish bones, heads and tails
4 stalks celery, sliced
4 medium carrots, sliced
2 medium onions, sliced
2 tsp. salt

Croquettes:
1½ lbs. fresh salmon fillets
½ lb. fresh yellow pike fillets
½ lb. fresh red snapper fillets
3 medium onions, chopped
4 large eggs, lightly beaten
3 tbsp. matzah meal
1 large carrot, grated
3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
Ground white or black pepper to taste

Put the stock ingredients in a large pot. Bring to a boil. Reduce the heat to low and simmer for 2 hours. In a food processor, finely grind the fish and onions. Stir in the eggs, matzah meal, carrot, parsley, salt and pepper. Place in the refrigerator until stock is ready.

Moisten your hands with cold water, repeating often while shaping the fish. Using a large spoon, remove about ⅓ cup of the fish mixture and shape into a ball. Gently drop the balls, one at a time, into the stock. Return the stock to a boil, cover, reduce the heat to low, and simmer for at least 1 hour and up to 2 hours. Add more water if the level threatens to fall below the fish.

Remove gefilte fish and carrots and place in a glass container. For a more gelatinous fish sauce, boil the stock until reduced by half. Strain the stock and pour enough over the fish to cover. Let cool, then store in the refrigerator.

Serve with horseradish. Yield: About 20 medium croquettes.

Honey an inseparable part of Rosh Hashanah tradition

"My son, eat you honey because it is good." (Psalms 24:13)

By CHANA FALIK
WZPS

Honey, the Hebrew word dvash, appears 48 times in the written Torah and is one of the Seven Species of the Land of Israel – described as "flowing with milk and honey."

Indeed, honey is good, especially at Rosh Hashanah. One of the most widespread customs at the New Year dinner table is eating apple slices dipped in honey while wishing one's family and friends a "good and sweet year."

Another is to bake traditional challot with honey as part of all of the liquid ingredients. In fact, there are dozens of creative and tasty ways to include honey in the holiday menu.

No place is the selection of recipes greater than in Israel, where a Rosh Hashanah meal among friends may include dishes from the four corners of the Jewish world. Each of the seven recipes below highlights a different Jewish community.

ISRAEL

Marinated Baked Perch

It is a custom in some Jewish communities to eat fish as a mark of hope for Divine blessing in the new year.

1 Nile perch (or trout)
2 tbsp. cider vinegar
1 tbsp. honey
2½ tbsp. soy sauce
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. ginger

Wash the fish well. Make incisions diagonally along both sides. Put fish aside to dry. Mix marinade. Soak fish in the marinade for an hour. Grease a pyrex dish. Place fish in dish and bake in a preheated 400 degree oven for 30 minutes. Remove from oven, turn the fish over and pour remaining marinade on top. Return to oven and cook for another 30 minutes or until fish flakes.

Honey plays key role in Rosh Hashanah tradition

Cut tip ends off unpeeled onions. Cook in boiling salted water until barely tender (about 10 minutes). Drain and cool. Peel off skins. Combine honey, margarine, salt, pepper and sherry in skillet. Heat and blend well. Add onions, cover, and cook until onions are well glazed (10 minutes), shaking pan frequently to prevent sticking. Uncover, cook 10 minutes more, until onions are golden brown.

RUSSIA

Cranberry Beer

Very tasty — similar to Israeli black (malt) beer, only better!

3½ cup honey
7¼ cups water
1 lb. cranberries

Place all ingredients in a medium sized pot. Bring to a boil and simmer until cranberries are tender. Let cool. Add ¼ pound of yeast. Mix well. Let the pot sit, covered, for three days in a cool, dark place (not in the refrigerator!).

When three days have passed, strain the mixture. Pour into jugs or return to the pot, and return it to its cool, dark resting place for seven additional days. When the week is up, put the liquid in the refrigerator to cool.

MIDDLE EAST

Baklavah

This middle-eastern delicacy is native to Syria, Jordan and Egypt, and is also popular in Greece, Macedonia and the Slavic countries.

1 lb. package of filo dough
1 lb. raw pistachio nuts or peanuts or walnuts (coarsely ground)
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup honey
¼ cup water
A few drops of lemon juice

Preheat oven to 400 degrees. Separate the filo dough into two halves. Roll out half of the dough and place it in a greased rectangular baking pan, or if preferred, an edged baking sheet. Brush generously with oil. Place the nut and cinnamon mixture on top and then cover with the other (rolled) half of filo dough. Using a wet knife, cut the raw filo mixture into little diamonds of about 1 square inch in size. Place pan/sheet in the oven and bake for 45 minutes or until golden brown. Mix honey, water and lemon drops in a saucepan. Bring to a boil and let simmer for 20 minutes. When the baklavah is fresh out of the oven and still hot, pour honey mixture over the top. Don't worry if there appears to be too much liquid.The bottom layer of filo dough should be totally soaked in the liquid mixture.

Piping hot kugel warms stomach and soul

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

It happens every year. Yom Kippur services conclude, and 15 minutes later, you're dashing in the door only seconds ahead of a hungry crowd.

"Can I help you?" someone asks, as your house fills with family and friends. People are polite, but ready to pounce. Like magic, they expect you to feed them – immediately.

With no time to whip up an elaborate spread for a beleaguered lot, many hosts fall back on Jewish fast food: bagels and lox, herring and sour cream, sliced tomatoes and onions – and a chilled cucumber salad.

There are reasons why this menu makes sense after fasting. Fish and vegetables are lighter on the stomach than meat. Smoked fish allows the body to replenish lost salt.

But after forgoing food for 24 hours, people need something to warm their souls and stomachs as well.

With Yom Kippur falling deeper into autumn this year, an assortment of piping hot kugels would particularly hit the spot.

Besides their perennial popularity, kugels are not only a perfect accompaniment to smoked fish and salads, they offer distinct advantages for break-the-fasts. They are easily prepared, can be made in advance and are almost foolproof. Their biggest selling point is that hosts can reheat them, while assembling the rest of the meal.

Adored by Ashkenazim, kugels are a bright spot in Jewish culinary history. A type of pudding, sometimes baked for hours, kugels may date back to the beginning of the last millennium.

Made from bread and flour, the first kugels were plain, salty rather than sweet. About 800 years ago, their flavour and popularity improved when cooks in Germany replaced bread mixtures with noodles or farfel. Eventually housewives incorporated eggs. The addition of cottage cheese and milk created a custard-like consistency, similar to what we're accustomed to today.

Early noodle recipes called for onions and salt

In the 17th century, sugar was introduced to kugel, giving home cooks the option of serving it as a side dish or dessert. In Poland, Jewish women sweetened the deal by sprinkling raisins and cinnamon into recipes. Pastry-loving Hungarians took the dessert concept further with a hefty helping of sugar and a dollop of sour cream.

While less renowned than their sweeter cousins, savoury kugels always existed. Early noodle recipes called for onions and salt. Tasty at room temperature, housewives served them for lunch on Shabbat. Over the centuries, inspired cooks have skipped the noodles, substituting potatoes, matzah, carrots, spinach or cheese. In Texas, chefs are using coriander and corn.

But in America, noodle pudding has always reigned supreme, rising to heights that our European ancestors never dreamed. Today, many people crown casseroles with corn flakes, graham cracker crumbs, ground gingersnaps or caramelized sugar. Inspired cooks are known to layer the dish with sliced pineapples or apricot jam.

Yet everything that's old is new again. With bread pudding recipes so trendy in gourmet magazines today, many Jewish women are serving them, inadvertently bringing kugel back to bread, its roots. Of course those in the know realize that, like French toast, the best bread puddings start with challah. The challah custard kugel below will consume any leftover challah from Rosh Hashanah before you purchase another round of rounds for Yom Kippur.

Playing counterpoint to its sugary competition, the mixed vegetable kugel is made from spinach, potato, carrots, mushrooms and onions. A hearty, nourishing dish after a fast, it calls for matzah meal too, so save the recipe for Passover.

Inspired by the Eastern European craving for white cheese kissed with sugar, this sweet cheese noodle pudding is a quintessentially classic kugel.

"Actually it is the king of kugels," says an independent filmmaker from New Jersey who provided her family recipe, which she serves every year to break the fast. With thousands of variations on the noodle pudding theme in circulation, kugel makers are often competitive and fiercely loyal.

There is a reason why these old-fashioned puddings remain a staple at synagogue suppers, meetings, brunches and holiday gatherings.

"Kugels are the ultimate Jewish comfort food, says a writing teacher from Manhattan, who would never break the Yom Kippur fast without one. Tired and hungry, her family appreciates a warm casserole on the table.

"After such a solemn day, they deserve a dish that's creamy, luscious and good."

VEGETABLE KUGEL

1 bunch (6-8) carrots
14 white mushrooms
1 potato, peeled
1 medium onion
2 cloves garlic
10 ounce pkg. frozen spinach, defrosted
2 eggs
1½ cups matzah meal (or flour)
½ cup Parmesan cheese

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Using a food processor, grate the carrots, mushrooms, potato, onion and garlic. Place in a large bowl. Add remaining ingredients and mix well. Fold into a greased 7 x 11-inch, oven-proof casserole. Bake for 50-60 minutes, or until top is crispy and vegetables bubble. Yield: 18 squares.

CHALLAH CUSTARD KUGEL

1 lb. challah, broken into bite-sized pieces sweet butter for greasing pan, plus 4 tbsp. at room temperature
8 oz. brick of reduced fat cream cheese, at room temperature
¾ cup maple syrup
12 eggs
3 cups of 2 percent milk
2½ tsp. vanilla
¼ tsp. ground nutmeg
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. Butter a 10 x 15-inch oven-proof casserole and spread challah pieces evenly throughout. Place 4 tbsp. butter, cream cheese and maple syrup in a microwave-safe container. Cover and microwave for one minute on high power. Mix well with a fork and pour evenly over challah.

In a large bowl, mix remaining ingredients until blended. Pour evenly over challah-cream cheese mixture. Press challah down with a spatula to moisten. Let rest 5 minutes.

Bake for 30 minutes, or until casserole bubbles and top is golden brown. Serve immediately, or prepare ahead, refrigerate and reheat. Recipe freezes well. Yield: 40 squares.

SWEET CHEESE NOODLE PUDDING

1 lb. broad noodles
⅔ cup sugar
24 oz. large curd cottage cheese
1 pint sour cream
4 eggs, beaten
2¼ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. vanilla
⅔ cup golden raisins
4 oz. cream cheese (not whipped) no-stick spray for greasing pan

Preheat oven to 350 degrees. In a large pot, prepare noodles according to package instructions. Drain water from noodles. Reserve.

In a large bowl, add remaining ingredients – except ¼ tsp. of the cinnamon. Blend well with a spoon. Add noodles, stirring well.

Grease a 9 x 13-inch oven-proof casserole with no-stick spray. Fold contents of bowl into casserole. Sprinkle remaining ¼ tsp. cinnamon on top.

Bake for 30-40 minutes, until kugel bubbles and turns light brown on top. Yield: 32 squares.

Rosh Hashanah, Calcutta style

By RAHEL MUSLEAH
Special to The CJN

When my family and I emigrated from Calcutta to Philadelphia in 1964, nobody had ever heard of a Jew from India.

I remember standing up in front of my Grade 2 class at the Solomon Schechter Day School, singing the Indian national anthem, Jana Gana Mana, as proof that I was really from India.

Despite the surge of interest in Sephardi culture, many people still don't know much about the Jews of India, a group of disparate communities from Cochin to Calcutta, isolated from each other by thousands of miles, as well as differing origins and customs.

Bombay's B'nei Israel community claims its origin dates back to the Greek persecution that brought on the Maccabean revolt. The Jews of Cochin, in South India, trace their roots back 2,000 years, although the earliest documentary evidence of the settlement dates from the 11th century CE. Many Portuguese Jews fled the Inquisition and made their home in Cochin.

A shack in Madhupur.

"Doodh wallah" carrying container of milk on his head.

The first Jew to settle in Calcutta was Shalome Cohen, a Syrian businessman who left his native Aleppo and made Calcutta his home in 1798.

He prospered and eventually became the court jeweller to the Nawab (nobleman) of Lucknow. Iraqi Jews streamed to India in the 1800s, to try to emulate Cohen's success as well as to escape the religious persecution in Baghdad from 1825 to 1835.

Eventually, the Calcutta Jewish community grew to a population of 5,000 at its peak in the 1940s, establishing five synagogues, two Jewish schools, a Jewish hospital and other Jewish institutions.

Today, only 50 Jews remain in Calcutta. About half the community made aliyah to Israel in 1948. The other half, afraid their economic circumstances would decline after India gained independence from Britain in 1947, scattered to other English-speaking countries such as England, Australia, Canada and the United States.

My parents, too, decided India was not the best place to raise a family anymore. My father was already familiar with America: he had been encouraged to enter the rabbinate by a Jewish chaplain stationed in Calcutta. My father was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, and went back to Calcutta to serve the community for 12 years.

We came to the United States by ship, and although Ellis Island was closed by then, our first glimpse of America was the Statue of Liberty.

We arrived in the United States in July, with Rosh Hashanah not far off. My father became the rabbi of Mikveh Israel, the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue in Philadelphia. He spent hours with a reel-to-reel tape player, learning the Sephardi melodies that differed from the familiar Calcutta chants.

My mother, who had worked as a secretary in Calcutta, learned to cook.

In Calcutta, we had relied on our Indian cook who was trained in the rules of kashrut, as did most Indian Jewish families.

Before we left, my mother followed the cook around and wrote down everything in two steno pads. The first things she tried to cook in America were: mahmoosa, an egg and potato dish; beet khata, a sweet-and-sour curry with dumplings; and aloomakalas, a round, deep-fried potato that is crisp on the outside, white and fluffy inside. Writing down recipes is easier than following them; we sampled a lot of burned food in those days!

Boy bathing in street.

When my mother turned to the women in the synagogue to guide her, they taught her how to make good Sephardi foods such as chopped liver, brisket, noodle kugel, matzah balls and sponge cake! Though Mikveh Israel follows the Spanish & Portuguese tradition, many of its members are Ashkenazi.

It was easier to assemble the foods for the special Rosh Hashanah mini-seder with which Sephardi Jews usher in the new year. The seder features foods that symbolize good wishes for the new year, including apple preserves spiced with whole cloves; dates stuffed with walnuts; pomegranate (may we be as full of mitzvot as this pomegranate is full of seeds); spinach; pumpkin; scallions and string beans. The blessings over the vegetables derive from puns on their Hebrew names that turn into wishes that our enemies should be destroyed.

In Calcutta, we also used a sheep's head to symbolize the biblical hope that we should be heads and not tails. Understandably, we did away with this particular dish in America!

The seder also reflects the kabbalistic influence on our community. We recite five biblical verses from 10 to 17 times each. The last verse is: "And you will have peace, and your house will have peace, and everything that is yours will have peace."

Nothing acid or sour is eaten on Rosh Hashanah, such as the sweet-and-sour Arabic dish called khatta. Instead, the meal consists of tempting dishes like mahmoora, chicken cooked with tomatoes, spices, almonds and raisins, served on a bed of pilau (rice) and topped with none other than roshinkes mit mandlen – more raisins and almonds sauteed quickly until crisp and golden. We even dip the challah into sugar, not salt, after reciting the Hamotzi.

In Calcutta, the distinctive home ritual is carried into the synagogue. Instead of one special Selichot service the Saturday night before Rosh Hashanah, Sephardi and Oriental Jews conduct Selichot – the special set of penitential prayers – all through the month of Elul. On erev Rosh Hashanah, a pre-dawn Selichot service began at 4 a.m., followed by the morning service and a visit to the cemetery.

Though I was too young to remember the synagogue observance, my parents have described Rosh Hashanah in the Maghen David Synagogue in Calcutta. At 6 a.m. on Rosh Hashanah morning, the synagogue, draped in white, began to fill with people, men dressed in white shark-skin suits (a shiny, heavy, polyester-like material). Women also wore as much white as possible.

The entire service was chanted aloud, and did not end until 1 p.m. The centrepiece of the service is a poem by Judah Samuel Abbas that describes the binding of Isaac. The shofar blasts also differ from the traditional Ashkenzi blasts: teruah is one long blast instead of nine short blasts.

Entire service chanted aloud

After the Torah reading, the solemn mood of the service shifted to that of an auction, as the aliyot, ark openings and other honours for the second day of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur went up for grabs. Honours for the first day were auctioned off the previous Shabbat.

Though the auction prolonged the service by almost an hour, nobody seemed to mind. Only the people interested in the bidding – about half the congregation – remained in the sanctuary, laughing and joking among themselves, but still paying very close attention.

Much of the bidding was done in increments of 26 – the numerical value of God's name – until the bidding reached 101, the numerical value of the guardian angel Michael's name. The opening of the ark on Kol Nidre night and reading the Haftorah traditionally drew the highest bids.

Parents bid on honours for their children as well. When the Torah was taken out, a special Haftorah scroll accompanied it; this light scroll was usually carried by a child. It was also a child's job to point to the beginning of the Torah portion with a yad, or pointer.

On Rosh Hashanah afternoon, many Calcutta families opened their homes to others for the traditional reading of the Book of Psalms, accompanied by a light meal of sweets and fruit.

While the distinctive Calcutta lifestyle has vanished with the dispersion of the community, my family follows many of the Calcutta customs, including the Rosh Hashanah seder. We continue to greet family and friends on Rosh Hashanah with the traditional blessing: Tizku l'shanim rabot, May you merit many years. The response is: Tizke ve'tihyeh: May you merit, and may you also live.

Rahel Musleah is a journalist, author and singer who presents programs on the Jewish communities of India. She is the editor/singer of Songs of the Jews of Calcutta.

One Glen Park reinvents the condominium

If the free spirit in you rebels at the notion of "downsizing" as you grow older, you'll be happy to know that at least one developer agrees with you.

David Feldman, President of Camrost-Felcorp, sets a new standard in elegant living with the launch of One Glen Park, an exclusive collection of condominium residences. It's only fitting that this cutting-edge development should occur in North York, where Camrost-Felcorp's previous successes include Village Gate, the Madison Centre, the Residences of Manhattan and Madison, and the Hollywood Plaza Grand Regent.

Barbara Klein, Community Sales Manager for Camrost-Felcorp, is well-acquainted with the frustration of prospective buyers who dread being shoehorned into smaller quarters — and their elation at finding an alternative. "Downsizing sounds great, until you're the one being downsized," she says. "This project is not just another condominium; it's a solution for people who want to not only maintain their existing lifestyle, but enhance it." Those disenchanted with boxlike offerings at other projects have found, with One Glen Park, that "they're not losing a home, they're moving into a better one. It's a house in condo's clothing," says Klein.

Gourmet kitchen with state-of-the-art appliances: everything a cook could want

Keeping Shabbos dinner where it belongs

Many have been so taken with the concept that they've purchased multiple units, and customized them to their taste — effectively building a brand new "dream home."

Equal space, with amenities galore — and without the hassles of property maintenance and security. What does it all mean?

It means Shabbos dinner for 20 is still Shabbos dinner for 20 — in your own home, not at your daughter's because you don't have room. It means you can still "run a restaurant" in your kitchen — a new, state-of-the-art kitchen that will make cooking for family and friends a greater pleasure than ever. (For larger gatherings, the well-appointed party room has kitchenette facilities suitable for on-site catering).

It means that when they visit, your children and grandchildren can surf the web to their hearts' content on the Rogers Wave high-speed connection.

This feature, notes Klein, is typical of One Glen Park's intrinsic value and attention to detail. "The quality is built in from floor to ceiling," she beams. "Features that are extra elsewhere are standard here."

Among many others, these features include spacious balconies, nine-foot ceilings in the main living areas, designer kitchens with state-of-the-art appliances, and elegant master ensuite baths complete with whirlpool.

You'll also enjoy private underground parking, an attentive concierge, and two custom-designed elevators, with one serving as a Shabbos elevator.

Ironclad security means you can pick up and leave at a moment's notice and travel without having to worry about your property or your vehicle.

One Glen Park also offers a number of other features other condos don't, like individual heating and cooling pumps, so you don't get stuck with inflated bills from shared heating and air conditioning. A complete fitness centre that would make an Olympian proud will allow you to enjoy the benefits of exercise year-round, as well as a rejuvenating steam shower.

As the Crown Jewel of Camrost-Felcorp's "Signature Collection", One Glen Park offers an array of options and finishes limited only to your imagination. Most buyers, she says, are taking full advantage — especially at the pre-construction prices in effect as of this writing.

Perhaps the greatest advantage of One Glen Park is its location. For those who've spent the better part of their adult lives in the Bathurst / Glencairn area, moving into One Glen Park means remaining connected to the old and familiar — shopping, restaurants, bakeries, synagogues. As one buyer noted, "You don't know how much it means to be able to walk to shul, the same shul I've gone to for 30 years — and to know that I'm still within walking distance of my children."

Pre-construction prices for limited time only

In the broader sense, living at One Glen Park means being part of a community, says Klein. Many purchasers to date were friends or neighbours to begin with, and were drawn to the project by word of mouth. Underscoring the neighbourly feeling is a main lobby, complete with fireplace, that would be the envy of the Waldorf Astoria. Upon seeing the artist's rendering, one buyer was moved to declare, "I guess now I'll have to wear designer shorts to pick up the mail!" — to which his wife retorted, "it's about time!"

Units range in price from $348,800 to just over $1 million, with considerable savings still available on a variety of features and options. Designer shorts are negotiable.

Whether we live in a new executive home or a vintage mansion, we're always short of storage space. Even with walk-in closets, pantries and linen cupboards, there's never quite enough room.

Interior designers say it's not the space that counts, but how you use it. How, indeed? That is the question.

With 26 years' experience in creative storage space design, Organized Interiors has the answers. They offer free consultation, then work with you in your home to fit your taste, space and budget. With Organized Interiors, anything's possible.

Want to double your closet space? Organized Interiors will transform any closet from an overcrowded mess to an organized wonder. You'll see your wardrobe at a glance, with everything in reach. In minutes, you'll decide what to wear, and put it on. Every morning, you'll save time and frustration.

The Organized Interiors closet includes whatever hanging rods, built-ins; racks, drawers and cupboards you need, to make space for your valuables. And it's custom designed and professionally installed to fit the character of your home.

Still need space? On an open wall, Organized Interiors can build a free-standing closet – with no mess to clean up after, decor that suits the room, and a floor-to-ceiling door mirror. And they can convert any spare room into a combined home office and guest room with storage cabinets.

In Organized Interiors' 13,000 sq. ft. state-of-the-art showroom, you'll find wall units, entertainment centres, wardrobes, bathroom units and office systems, ready for assembly or installation. There's also plenty of cabinet hardware and household conveniences.

Organized Interiors is Canada's largest designer, manufacturer and installer of creative home storage. Behind their reputation stand decades of superior work, combining the experience of four companies.

In 1974, they opened as McDoors & Closets. After acquiring two other innovative companies – The Closet Shop, and Prestige Closets – the retailer evolved into Organized Interiors. Marketing Manager Harry Levinson had also spent ten years with The Closet Shop.

Obituary

'King of Spadina,' Harry Henig dies at 91

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Known as the "King of Spadina," Harry Henig operated a womenswear store for 30 years and then began a second career as an author. He died recently at the age of 91.

Henig retired from the Fashion Centre at St. Clair Avenue and Dufferin Street in 1980 and proceeded to write seven books. He finished his seventh book, Prisoner of Destiny, just two weeks before his death, and was already planning another based on the people he met at 100 Canyon Ave., an apartment building where he lived.

He lived in Hearst, Sask., and Brantford, Ont., before coming to Toronto, said his only surviving daughter, Louise Levy, of New York.

"He had a hard life, coming to the new world all by himself, in 1921, at the age of 12, only to find that his father had died and his uncle had cheated him of any money left to him," Levy said.

"All the royalties from his books, about $30,000, were donated to the Shaarei Zedek Hospital in Israel.The library at Hebrew University is named after my mother, Fanny, and the music room after my late sister, Sheila."

Henig's daughter, pianist Sheila Henig, predeceased him in 1979.

His books included one about his daughter, Sheila. One of his best known books was Behind Hospital Walls, about his own experiences in Toronto hospitals. He also wrote a novel.

Henig was a member of Beth Sholom Synagogue, where he sang in the Yiddish choir, and he was a close friend of the synagogue's former spiritual leader, Rabbi David Monson, his daughter said.

In addition to his daughter, Henig is survived by three grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

Family to dedicate hall to synagogue 'matriarch'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hetty Josephs, who died four years ago at the age of 94, was known as a social, gregarious and beautiful woman – "the matriarch of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation," according to her daughter, Phyllis Sugar.

So it is entirely appropriate that her family chose to remember her by dedicating the banquet hall in her memory.

The Hetty Josephs Hall will be dedicated at 8 p.m. on September 21. Besides the dedication, there will be an illustrated talk by Rochelle Carrady.

Carrady helped research the Fugu Plan, which was an attempt by Japan, before World War II, to create a Jewish homeland in Manchuria.

While the project was unsuccessful, it set the stage for the issuing of the Japanese visas which allowed many European Jews to escape the Holocaust.

Carrady also helped Rabbi Marvin Tokayer research the remnants of Jewish communities in Japan, China and India, where whole communities unwittingly observe Jewish practice.

Josephs' granddaughter, artist Terri Sugar Keyfitz, has dedicated a painting to Josephs which hangs in the banquet hall. The six-foot square canvas represents different aspects of Jewish life.

Josephs, who was born in England, came to Canada in 1939, just before the outbreak of World War II.

Sugar told The CJN that her mother had "a marvellous sense of humour." Josephs was "a beautiful person in every way."

The evening is open to the public and refreshments will be served.

Canadians bring home AEPi awards

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tau Omega, based at the University of Toronto, received Alpha Epsilon Pi's Louis Sherr Outstanding Chapter Award at the Jewish fraternity's annual convention, held last month in Las Vegas.

One of the reasons, said chapter president Nathaniel Lipkus, was the chapter's attendance rate and closeness. Members have to provide a written reason if they are unable to attend a meeting. Among their volunteer activities, they packed Passover boxes for National Council of Jewish Women, and worked on a clothing drive.

Also, York University student Jay Klein was named Undergraduate Supreme Governor and, in a separate honour, he received the Louis Heller Oustanding Exchequer Award as treasurer of the year.

The position of undergraduate supreme governor (which he shares with a California member) is analogous to being president of the over 4,000 undergraduate AEPi members in North America. In this role, Klein will serve as liaison between the undergrads and the "supreme board," made up of AEPi alumni.

His duties include representing AEPi at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities in Chicago this November. A campus visit to Boston area universities is also planned.

Klein, 20, moved to Toronto from West Palm Beach, Fla., two years ago when he entered York University, where he is majoring in political science and mass communications. A native of Syracuse, where he lived until age 7, he spent 11 summers at Camp Ramah in Utterson, Ont.

He was elected president of his pledge class in first year and last year, he was chapter treasurer.

"I look at AEPi like my business. This year we were able to set new highs in the bank balance...we ended up with about a $4,500 surplus. When I started, we were about $800 in the red." Funds raised are donated to charities, and also used to assist students who are not able to afford fraternity fees, which run about $400 the first year (a relatively low fee for AEPi, because York does not have a frat house, he noted).

Other AEPi awards included:

Ilan Barda, adviser to Eta Omicron chapter at McMaster University, received the A. Edward Scherer Outstanding Chapter Adviser Award.

Thierry Elmaleh and Neil Grunberg of Epsilon Chi at McGill University won the Philip Cohen Undergraduate Achievement Keys. Grunberg is now an AEPi chapter consultant in the United States.

Of the 105 AEPi chapters in North America, only six are located in Canada: Canadians were well represented among the over 30 award winners.

Fraternities are discouraged at York

TORONTO — Tau Omega, the Jewish fraternity chapter based at York University, is not officially recognized on campus.

The policy denying official status to fraternities and sororities (Presidential Regulation Number 5) was approved in 1990, replacing a previous ban.

Rumours still surface, however, that fraternity members risk expulsion, but that is not true, said Anne Marie Ridley of York's Student Affairs office.

"If we have complaints regarding the behaviour of members of a fraternity, we'll deal with the behaviour, if it's against our code of conduct," she clarified.

The university provides facilities to fraternities on the same basis as it does to other off-campus groups, the policy states.

Reasoning behind the regulation includes concerns that students might be deflected from participating in other campus organizations, and that "their commitment to exclusivity" is inconsistent with values of accessibility and tolerance, according to the preamble.

Jeremy Zacks, president of the 62-member Tau Omega chapter, is not worried about sanctions. There has been "the odd issue," he admitted, citing as one instance the acceptability of posting notices on campus about AEPi events.

Ironically, Jay Klein was hesitant to join AEPi initially because of the hazing tragedies he'd heard of in the United States, where fraternities are more common.

He does not believe the concerns expressed by the university are warranted in AEPi's case. He doesn't think that AEPi members would necessarily become involved with other campus organizations were they not involved with AEPi, and said that potential members would not be turned away if they couldn't afford the fees.

Also, he added, "we are a haze-free chapter." (The international organization has an anti-hazing policy.)

"I was most pleased with the outcome [of joining AEPi]," said Klein. "It's done a lot for me."

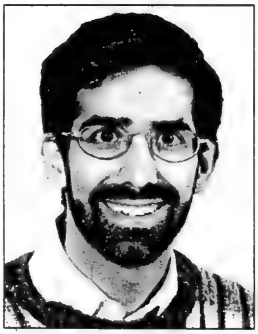
York prof plans Web site on medieval Jewish Spain

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Pre-modern Spain was a nation of immense cultural richness prior to the xenophobic upheavals which led to the persecution and expulsion of its Jewish and Muslim inhabitants.

"It was a place where Christian and Muslim kingdoms existed side by side, with people of different religious backgrounds and outlooks living in each region, and where Jews were integrated into the mix," says Eric Lawee, a 37-year-old York University intellectual historian working on a path-breaking interdisciplinary Web site that may be of benefit to scholars, students and lay people alike.



Eric Lawee

The site, Medieval Spain: Antiquity to the New World (CE 100-1550), which will encompass Portugal, is sponsored by Stanford University's Humanities Laboratory. A preliminary version is scheduled to go online next year.

Lawee, a Jewish studies specialist in the humanities department, is one of four investigators Stanford chose to develop the site as well as a HypertextBook, a flexible and evolving device that allows viewers to consult multiple translations of texts alongside their originals and to study related research material.

The author of a forthcoming book on Isaac Abarbanel, a stellar Spanish Jewish personality of the 15th century, Lawee hopes to test the site in a course he intends to give in the 2001-02 academic year, called Church, Mosque and Synagogue: Jews, Muslims and Christians in Medieval Spain.

At the moment, though, the site is in its early stages of development. "We are setting up equipment, coordinating software and determining our agenda," he explained.

Lawee, a University of Toronto graduate, will contribute his expertise to the project in two distinctive fields: Hispano-Jewish thought and literature and late medieval Jewish-Christian social and religious interaction.

He brings formidable credentials to the task. He has a PhD in Judaic studies from Harvard and possesses a reading knowledge of four key languages: Spanish, Arabic, Hebrew and Latin.

In his view, pre-modern Spain is worth studying because its cultural complexity strikes empathetic chords today.

"I think that as issues of religious and ethnic diversity, pluralism and the like take centre stage in our own culture, and as we probe the relationship of the three great Western monotheistic religions, interest in Spain grows here."

From a strictly Jewish perspective, he added, Spain has been an alluring topic since the onset of Jewish studies in 19th-century Germany.

"There is in Jewish historiography what one recent medievalist referred to as the 'Sephardic mystique.'

"There are a number of reasons for that. In part, this phenomenon reflects an interest in the idea of Jews retaining Jewish identity while also participating – and appropriating the best of – their larger cultural milieu.

"Spanish Jews succeeded on this score better than any other pre-modern Jewry, at least on some reckonings, though historians now know better than simply to speak of a 'Golden Age,' even with regards to the history of the Jews in Muslim Spain.

"The issue of cross-cultural interaction is one thing that drew me to Spain. Another attraction is simply the remarkable spiritual personalities to emerge from the Jewish communities of medieval Muslim and Christian Spain – Maimonides, Isaac Abarbanel and so forth. The list is long and impressive."

Lawee wrote his PhD thesis on Abarbanel, and his book, Isaac Abarbanel's Stance Towards Tradition: Defence, Dissent and Dialogue (State University of New York Press), is based on that dissertation.

"The book approaches Abarbanel from the integrating perspective of his negotiations with texts and teachings bequeathed to him from the Jewish past. It also views him as a transitional figure from medieval to early modern Jewish philosophy and interpretation," he says.

An observant Jew, Lawee considers Abarbanel a compelling figure. "First, of course, there is his remarkable biography.

Here is the product of a noble Iberian family living a rich life during a turbulent period who was a financier and courtier in three major southern European centres – Spain, Portugal and Italy. He was also Spanish Jewry's foremost figure, a versatile and erudite Jewish scholar and an amazingly prolific writer.

"In terms of my chosen theme, what attracted me to Abarbanel was the combination of small-c conservatism and creativity that I found in his works and at the centre of his religious-intellectual persona. I wanted to explore this combination of reverence for the past and willingness to innovate, often daringly.

"I confess that I probably saw some contemporary relevance in all of this. Abarbanel's urbane traditionalism is sorely lacking on the current Jewish scene."

'Abarbanel's urbane traditionalism is sorely lacking'

Lawee, the son of David and Joyce Lawee, a retired U of T medical professor and a social worker respectively, plans to integrate Abarbanel into the HypertextBook. "I will use him on the Web site as a way to open up the whole experience of Jews in Christian Iberia – Spain and Portugal – from printing to Inquisition and from cross-cultural fertilization to expulsion."

And if funding comes through, he and his collaborators will expand the Web site right into the 20th century.

As he put it: "We want to produce a site that appeals to a wider audience, ranging from scholars of medieval Europe eager to engage in comparative history to cultural institutions interested in bridging gaps between religious communities today."

Coast to Coast

Internal problems seen as threat to Israel

Yet, in the meantime, the yawning divisions between haredim and secular Jews show no sign of healing.

Sustained by the dream that Israel can be both "a moral Jewish state and a normal state," Horovitz expressed regret about "the unfortunate degree to which politics and religion are intertwined" in Israel.

He said that rabbis would be more credible figures if they were not so linked with politics.

David Horovitz

In theory, Horovitz supports the idea of separating synagogue and state in Israel. "But how do you do it?" he asked plaintively, referring to the disproportionate influence religious parties exert on the political system.

Horovitz voiced concern that Israel's Supreme Court is coming under increasingly bitter attack by haredi politicians, namely those in Shas, Israel's third largest political party, with 17 Knesset seats.

In his book, he writes, "There are powerful forces here for whom Orthodoxy is a priority and democracy an irritant."

Horovitz chastised Prime Minister Ehud Barak for having pandered politically to Shas in his quest to sign peace treaties with the Arabs.

And he predicted that Barak, in the interests of achieving peace with the Palestinians and Syria, will not only invite Shas back into his coalition government, but will also blithely set aside his recently announced agenda for a "secular revolution" in Israel.

In his estimation, Barak is very vulnerable politically and could yet be defeated in the next election. "Incumbent prime ministers don't win elections in Israel, at least in the past 30 years."

It would not surprise Horovitz if Benjamin Netanyahu, the disgraced ex-prime minister, makes a comeback and takes control of Likud. "Netanyahu could easily establish himself as opposition leader."

In his view, Netanyahu misruled Israel, shutting down bridge-building with the Palestinians, freezing warming relations with moderate Arab states and embarrassing Jordan and Egypt about having made peace with Israel.

"He stretched my faith in this country and its people, weakened my personal attachment to it and my confidence in their judgment, to the point where I was reluctantly prepared to consider living somewhere else."

According to Horovitz, Israeli democracy is not as stable as many believe. "We have killed one prime minister – Yitzhak Rabin – and the potential for further political violence is undeniable. Death threats to politicians and judges are now routine. Our leaders move around in cordons of bodyguards."

Nevertheless, since Rabin's assassination five years ago in November, Israelis have learned to be more tolerant of each other's political views.

"People looked into the abyss in terms of the viciousness of the debate and drew back," he observed.

As a result, there is a greater readiness by Israelis to consider political arrangements with the Arabs they may have rejected out of hand a few short years ago.

Horovitz was loathe to comment about the chances of Israel and the Palestinians reaching a post-Camp David peace agreement. But he said that the two sides have reached "an acutely sensitive, critical period."

He added that Israelis are "thirsty for an end to the conflict, even at a painful cost."

An accord with Syria is still far off, since Bashar al-Assad, Syria's new leader, is trying to cement his hold on the country, he noted.

And since its unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon on May 24, Israel is no longer under pressure to make sweeping territorial concessions to Syria on the Golan Heights.

Ottawa man guilty in bomb plot

MONTREAL — An Ottawa man of Egyptian origin pleaded guilty to possessing explosives as part of a plot to bomb the Israeli consulate.

Ayman Bondok, a 23-year-old pizza-delivery man, is scheduled to be sentenced Sept. 22.

Bondok admitted to constructing a crude bomb and concealing it in the Montreal apartment of Tarek Khafagy, 30, an Egyptian refugee, who is co-accused in the case. Bondok also admitted to making an anonymous call to the consulate in February threatening to blow it up unless Israel released Lebanese prisoners.

Bondok also admitted to phoning the RCMP anonymously to inform on Khafagy, who has adamantly maintained his innocence.

Khafagy, who claimed refugee status on account of being a member of a persecuted Christian minority in Egypt, will go on trial in October.

Bondok also told the RCMP that Khafagy was linked to the Hezbollah terrorist group, but the RCMP has found no such link.

Bondok's girlfriend has also testified that Bondok had a grudge against Khafagy and wanted him thrown out of Canada. She indicated that there had been bitter feelings between their families in Egypt.

Dilemma over property

The gala and day-long WJC executive meeting preceding it were also attended by Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen and national executive director Jack Silverstone.

The foundation was actually established in June in Jerusalem to address a vexing question: should unclaimed assets be used to fund Holocaust education around the world, or go directly to survivors, many of whom need the money for immediate needs?

"It's not an easy problem," conceded Elan Steinberg, the WJC's executive director, in a CJN telephone interview from New York. "There are very different views in the survivor community."

Nothing is preventing funds from going both to survivors and Holocaust education, museums and research, but as Steinberg notes, a microcosm of the debate is best seen in south Florida.

There, leaders in the survivor community, which numbers at least 15,000, have mounted a vocal campaign, saying all money from unclaimed assets should go to survivors for health care and social welfare.

'It's not an easy problem'

They say their needs are immediate and pressing: home and nursing care, rent, medication, sometimes even food.

They also underscore a sobering statistic: of the world's estimated 250,000 survivors, 1,000 die each month.

Few disagree that the need is greatest in the former Soviet Union, where poor Jews, including survivors, receive 3 million hot meals and 800,000 food packages a year, funded by the sale of unclaimed Jewish property in the former East Germany.

As well, 18,000 survivors in the former Soviet Union, Israel and the United States receive home care, also as a result of the sale of East German assets.

But in Canada, at least, an opposite view was sounded by Michael Rosenberg, acting president of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada.

Emphasizing that he was expressing a personal opinion, Rosenberg said the "bulk" of unclaimed assets should go to "the Jewish educational process."

"Most survivors [here] have done well for themselves. They're not in any breadlines," he said. "Sometimes, an individual's greed exceeds his morality."

In Canada, some of the money could go toward offsetting the high cost of a private Jewish education, he suggested.

Other funds could go for communal outreach to the Jewish elderly and needy survivors, Rosenberg said.

Asked to estimate what proportion of his organization's members would want to see unclaimed assets go toward survivors versus community endeavors, Rosenberg said: "It's probably 50-50."

But the CJC's Silverstone, who is not a survivor, believes the lion's share of unclaimed war-era assets should go to survivors who need help.

"The needs of needy survivors should be given every priority. I think that's the consensus in the Jewish world," Silverstone told The CJN before leaving for the WJC meeting.

"Research and commemoration are also important, but far less than responding to the needs of survivors."

His view could be buttressed by a new study on poverty among Canadian Jews. The study, by Carleton University Prof. Allan Moscovitch, found that one in six Jews in Canada is poor [CJN, Aug. 31].

It also found that nearly 21 percent of Jews aged 65 and over were living in poverty, compared with 17 percent of all Canadians in that age group. That would include many Holocaust survivors.

The needs of survivors worldwide were also reflected in the distribution of nearly $200 million earmarked by Swiss banks specifically for immediate humanitarian needs.

In Canada, $3.7 million was distributed in short order to 7,091 survivors, for an average payment of $521. Many thousands of late claims were also received.

Community leaders observed that although some bogus claims were probably received, the speed with which the funds were distributed showed there was a need among survivors.

But Rosenberg of Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada said many recipients of those funds were asked to donate their allotment to charity. It's not known how many did.

One of the issues before community leaders is what to do with unused Jewish communal property – synagogues, mikvot, schools – in former communist countries where remaining Jews are elderly and where their numbers are dwindling.

Silverstone said it's unrealistic to ask the small Jewish community in, for example, Poland, to maintain an infrastructure that served three million Jews before the war.

An option, he said, is to sell buildings and other assets.

The WJC's Steinberg agreed, saying another option being floated is to turn half of all communal property in Poland over to the World Jewish Restitution Organization "for purposes undetermined."

The debate over balancing resources with competing needs will go on until next June, when a formal report is to be tabled on what to do with unclaimed Jewish assets, Steinberg said.

Synagogue garden thefts wilt volunteer's spirits

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — After two years of trying to beautify the flower gardens at Or Shalom synagogue, Celia Brauer has given up. Several thefts from the gardens have finally withered her spirit.

"It's made me very upset. Livid, actually," says Brauer, a master gardener by trade. "They carefully stole the plants that were looking nice and probably put the flowers in their home in a vase."

For two consecutive summers, Brauer donated her time and outdoor plants to help spruce up the front and back gardens at Or Shalom, located at Fraser Street and 10th Avenue in east Vancouver. With the help of her husband, Brauer spent untold hours weeding the old and planting the new.

But the rash of garden thefts made Brauer decide to throw in her spade. "I've given up. It's not easy to keep on making things beautiful, just to see them get taken away," she says.

Brauer first purchased a bunch of plants on sale in September 1998, her first year as Or Shalom's volunteer gardener. She'd noticed the front bed of the synagogue's yard was looking rather unsightly, and decided to do something to improve it. "It looked pretty ugly, so I got some nice plants that were going to be winter flowering, like scimia, sarcocca – which really smells beautiful – winterbox azalea and dwarf bamboo," she says.

Soon after planting the first batch of flora, Brauer remembers attending a synagogue dinner and noticing that one or two of the plants were missing. "I was disappointed, but there wasn't much we could do about it," she says.

> 'If it's not chained down, people will take it'

"They were all in bloom at the time, so they were pretty and they smelled nice, and as the weeks went by even more plants were stolen."

The thieves left some of the larger plants – like dwarf cedars and rhododendrons – intact, but Brauer was worried they would soon strike again and steal those, too.

"I took the rest of them home," she says. "I just dug them up, thinking, 'I can't stand it anymore.' "

The following spring, Brauer decided to try again. She and her husband thought decorating the Or Shalom gardens with prickly, native shrubs would deter all but the most aggressive thief. But a few weeks after weeding and replanting, she again noticed holes in the synagogue's garden and yard.

"They took the prickly shrubs and all of the smaller, unique plants. They seemed not to want the big ones, so they took at least three or four of our dwarf mahonia," she says. "They picked the smaller shrub roses and a variegated leaf rhododendron, which is a pretty, small – and quite unique – yellow-leafed plant."

Brauer believes that someone in the neighbourhood is responsible for the recurring thefts. The area is no stranger to car thefts and home invasions. However, she doesn't believe that garden or plant theft is solely a local experience.

"People take plants – it doesn't matter where you live. If it's not chained down, people will take it," she says.

"I'm considering putting electrical shocks in the soil," she adds, without a hint of sarcasm. "Or I'll put a sign up: 'You will feel an electric shock if you take these plants,' or something like that."

Or Shalom administrator Frank Segal hasn't reported the thefts to police. "There seems to be a rash of plant thievery all over Vancouver," he says.

Brauer says she won't replant Or Shalom's gardens next spring.

Wary of single issue support

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Over the years, evangelical Christians in Parliament have proved to be great supporters of the Jewish community. Regardless of their partisan stripes, they love Israel and hold a special place in their hearts for the religion that gave rise (excuse the pun) to Jesus.

Yet, Jewish friends have often commented that there is always a spectre hovering over evangelicals' relationship with Jews and support for Jewish issues. There is a perception that beneath the warm exterior lies an undefined resentment towards Jews, the group that should have most accepted Jesus as their conduit to personal salvation, but rejected him as a false prophet.

It's in this context that we consider the support for Stockwell Day from within the Jewish community. For several months now, the dwindling Tory faithful have grumbled about statements of support from within the Jewish community for the new Canadian Alliance (CA) leader. Much of that support has its source in the Toronto-based fight to secure government funding for Jewish schools.

Focusing on comments by Stockwell Day, the pro-funding groups have rallied behind his call for government to support private, religion-based schools. Of course, Day speaks from personal experience, having been professionally associated with one such Christian school in Alberta.

Extending support to a political party or candidate whose policies closely match one's own is a basic element of the democratic process. Thus, if Stockwell Day reflects values that are close to the hearts of some Jewish groups, it is perfectly appropriate to align themselves with the CA leader and his party.

That having been said, it would be prudent to offer a couple of caveats. First, is the political undertaking meaningful? Even though Day couched his promise in terms of income tax policy, it is unlikely he could ever deliver on a commitment to extend government funding to Jewish schools. Primary and secondary schooling is an exclusively provincial jurisdiction. Day's policy therefore, is virtually meaningless.

Second, and perhaps more important, single issues are a potentially dangerous way to determine where one should place political support. Proclaiming support for the CA simply on the strength of one statement (and in this case, an almost worthless one) without thoughtful consideration of all other aspects of the party's platform, poses some serious risks. Such groups must ask themselves: Is it worth it?

Give Diaspora a say on Jerusalem's future: Hecht

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An "estates-general of the Jewish people" should be called before the Israeli government makes any decision that would alter the status of Jerusalem, says Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region.

Speaking at a fund-raiser for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR), Hecht said it must be impressed upon the Israeli leadership that "a large part of the Diaspora" believes, like he does, that Israel should maintain full control over all of the city.

Since the Camp David Summit in July failed to reach an agreement, there have been reports that the government of Ehud Barak is looking at various models which will allow the Palestinians some sovereignty over parts of east Jerusalem.

Hecht predicted "dire" consequences if Israel relinquishes its authority over any of Jerusalem.

"I'm asking Jews to convey to Israel, what so many of us harbour so deep in our hearts, that a Jewish Jerusalem must be preserved," said Hecht.

Hecht was borrowing the term "estates-general" from the Quebec government, which is about to embark on a lengthy examination of the status of the French language under that title.

He later explained to The CJN that what he is seeking has had numerous precedents. When an important issue affecting Israel arises that also has an impact on the Diaspora, Israeli leaders have convened "solidarity meetings."

They have been held by prime ministers Golda Meir, Menachem Begin, Yitzhak Rabin, and, most recently, by Yitzhak Shamir and Shimon Peres, in the 1980s when U.S. Secretary of State James Baker caused a furore when he threatened to cut off credits to Israel, Hecht said.

"The potential division of Jerusalem is not only an Israeli issue; it is an issue for every Jew," Hecht said. "Jerusalem is the indivisible capital, not only of Israel, but of the Jewish people. It belongs to all Jews, not only Israeli Jews."

Hecht said he has floated his idea with Israelis of different political parties and Zionist leaders in the U.S. "I am not a voice in the wilderness on this," he said.

Hecht, a longtime Likud sympathizer, quoted Rabin as writing in 1993: "The struggle for the status and the future of Jerusalem still lies ahead. We, of course, shall not budge an inch from our historical positions – united Jerusalem remains the permanent capital of Israel and the Jewish people under Israeli sovereignty."

Hecht says he fears Israel has reached the stage of negotiating "the peace of the exhausted... a peace at the cost of surrendering the very symbols of our Jewish identification."

Hecht, a member of the CIJR board of directors, said world Jewry should not hesitate to confront Israel over this issue. "We cannot create any more of a split than already exists," he said.

Hecht's idea appeared to have the endorsement of the guest speaker at the CIJR event, Morton Klein, national president of the Zionist Organization of America, a right-of-centre Israel lobby group.

Klein emphasized that, aside from security considerations, Israelis have "a moral right" to the land they now control because it is "holy" to them.

"When the media speak of 'historically Arab east Jerusalem' they are wrong. Jerusalem has always been Jewish, since the reign of King David 3,000 years ago. As far back as the mid-1800s, Jews were a majority in east Jerusalem."

Klein stated emphatically that Jerusalem is not holy to Islam. Whereas Jews have always prayed to Jerusalem and the Bible is full of references to it, Klein said, Muslims pray to Mecca and there is not one mention of Jerusalem in the Koran.

"The proof that east Jerusalem is not holy to Muslims is the way the Arabs treated it from 1948 to 1967 when they controlled it. It became a slum," he said.

Yassir Arafat's insistence on having east Jerusalem is "simply a way to take our heart and soul away from us... If Arafat gets east Jerusalem, that's not where it will end."

Privacy Rights Charter proposed

OTTAWA — Privacy should be a right protected by law, Senator Sheila Finestone believes, and she is asking Canadians to support her proposed Privacy Rights Charter.

"Privacy is a core social value that goes to the very heart of preserving human dignity and autonomy," says Finestone.

Bill S-27: An Act to Guarantee the Human Right to Privacy was introduced in the Senate by Finestone in June. This fall, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will hold public hearings on the bill.

"Public opinion polls have consistently indicated that Canadians are concerned about how all-encompassing and widespread the monitoring of their personal lives has become as a result of computer databases, video surveillance cameras and DNA testing," says Finestone, the former MP for MBill S-27 would guarantee the right to privacy of every individual, including physical privacy, freedom from surveillance, freedom from monitoring and interception of private communications, and freedom from the gathering, use and disclosure of personal information.

Individuals or groups who wish to be witnesses before or make submissions to the Senate committee on the bill should call Keli Hogan at 613-943-7793.

Frayda Wiesenthal in Israel.

Counsellor helps to enpower Israeli women

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It is said in Jewish tradition that when you save a life, it is as if you save a whole world. Similarly, Frayda Wiesenthal believes that when you help one woman empower herself, you are empowering a whole world.

Wiesenthal, a Winnipeg-based family counsellor, spent the last eight months "empowering whole worlds" in Jerusalem, volunteering at the Mercaz Yeutz La'Isha, a counselling centre for women established by a group of feminist therapists.

Wiesenthal was sent to Israel for being the first recipient of the Arthur Minden Leadership Award, which sends young professionals to the Holy Land to further social change and pluralism.

"The Arthur Minden Leadership Award has enabled me to contribute to the process [of social change] in Israel, both as a Jew and as a feminist," Wiesenthal says.

During her stint at the centre she kept a busy schedule. "I helped organize workshops for the staff to do with victims of domestic violence and rape, gave lectures to professionals in the community and helped the centre staff write a book on feminist therapy. I also helped the staff with day to day activities. I lucked out in having a great group of people to work with. It was an exciting and interesting experience."

The Arthur Minden Award was established by the family of the late Toronto lawyer and community leader – he died in 1966 – in recognition of his passion for Israel. It is given in connection with the New Israel Fund, a group of North Americans, Europeans and Israelis who promote social advancement in Israel and Shatil, a centre that trains volunteers like Wiesenthal.

Wiesenthal first visited Israel for a summer when she was 16.

She returned again after high school in 1973-74 and developed what she describes as a strong affinity for the country. After graduating from university in 1977, she lived in Israel for three years. Since 1980, she has been working in Winnipeg, providing counselling service in areas involving women's health and domestic violence.

Two years ago, she visited her sister and brother-in-law in Israel. "The country had changed so much from when I was there last," she says. "I became aware of the many different social and cultural issues. I thought it would be neat to go back in a year or two and work in my profession. The drawback is that you need money to live there until you find work in your field."

That money came with the award and Wiesenthal is grateful for that. Now back in Winnipeg, she says she would really like to return to Israel.

Art contest winners

VAUGHAN — Three Associated Hebrew School students were recently honoured for winning an art contest sponsored by Tina Molinari, Thornhill MPP.

Molinari congratulated Eli Weinstein, Jordana Belillti and Robyn Deverett, winners of her Rosh Hashanah artwork contest.

The students, who are all at Associated's Atkinson campus, were presented with a framed copy of their winning picture by Molinari.

"I was very pleased with the response to the contest," Molinari said. "Judging was difficult, but Eli, Jordana and Robyn each impressed me with their pictures, symbolizing different aspects of this important event."

The contest was organized by Molinari to solicit pictures from students to use on her High Holy Day cards for 5761. The contest was open to all Jewish schools in the riding of Thornhill. Judging was conducted by Molinari and her staff.

Israel seminar proves an 'intense' experience

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two young members of the Jewish community who took part in a unique "diplomatic" leadership seminar in Israel returned home enthusiastic about their roles as community leaders.

Eta Yudin and Emmanuel Castiel were two of three Canadian delegates to the third Young Jewish Leadership Diplomatic Seminar. The recent three-week seminar was designed to solidify Israeli-Diaspora bonds and to arm current and future Jewish leaders with expertise on Israel for their local Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

Yudin, 27, and Castiel, 26, were among some 30 participants from 16 countries. All were hand-picked by local Israeli diplomatic missions and then approved by Israel's Foreign Ministry, which organized the trip.

Besides Canada, whose delegation also included Marni Silver of Toronto, participating countries included Russia, Italy, Great Britain, Yugoslavia, Brazil, Turkey, South Africa and the United States, which sent 11.

At the seminar, delegates participated in dawn-to-dusk work sessions, and meetings in a Jerusalem hotel with Israeli bureaucrats, politicians and academics.

Both Yudin and Castiel said they felt a definite sense of responsibility, and sometimes overwhelming "intensity," as part of the mission. But what impressed them the most was the degree to which the trip helped them appreciate and put into perspective the dynamics of the other Jewish communities that took part.

"They were dealing with issues on a totally different scale than our own," observed Yudin, who is communications officer with Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region.

Many of the participating countries have small Jewish communities "fighting to stay Jewish," she added. "That's why we plan to have follow-up activities with the other countries. We really gained from everybody else's experiences."

Castiel, a lawyer now working on his MBA, similarly gleaned more from personal interactions with the other young leaders than through the actual presentations, he said

However, neither Yudin nor Castiel downplayed the importance of the seminar.

Certainly, Yudin and Castiel both brought plenty of community service experience to the experience. Yudin co-founded the International Student Coalition for Israeli MiAs, and has volunteered with Hillel, Student Federation, the Aliyah Centre, Bnei Akiva and the Canadian Zionist Federation.

Castiel has worked with the Jewish Education Council's Am Echad, Projet Action Sociale en Israël, and the Communauté Sépharade du Québec's Young Leadership Development program.

These experiences helped prepare them for the seminar, which involved numerous meetings with experts on many issues, including the Holocaust, Israel-Diaspora relations, Israeli foreign relations, the economy, the peace process and Israel's "political culture."

Among those the group met with were Israeli president Moshe Katsav; the Jordanian ambassador to Israel; Meir Rosenne, former Israeli ambassador to the United States; MK and Peres Peace Institute director-general Uri Savir; other Israeli MKs; Holocaust scholar Prof. Yehuda Bauer; and Hebrew University Prof. Steven M. Cohen.

Yudin said the group also benefited from the "variety of the topics. It was a long day, but we were there to get the most out of it."

Among the memories that truly stood out for the participants was their trip to the Lebanese border only a few weeks after Israeli troops pulled out of South Lebanon.

Castiel also recalled the mayor of Metullah, which is near the border, relating how, with Katyusha rockets no longer being fired over the border by Hezbollah, "we now sleep quieter at night, if not necessarily better."

Another vivid memory for Yudin, who was on her seventh trip to Israel, was the opportunity to meet not only with Jewish Israelis, but with Arab, Bedouin and Druze Israelis, too.

The group even met with the chief justice of an Islamic court, a man who expressed his concerns that Arab Israelis are not being treated as equal citizens.

For Castiel, who was on his third visit, the high point came in the simple pursuit of spending a lingering day in Jerusalem.

"This was definitely the trip where I felt the most attached to Israel," he said. "The first time I went was when I was 17. But this time, I realized it was not just a religious city, but the political and social centre of the country."

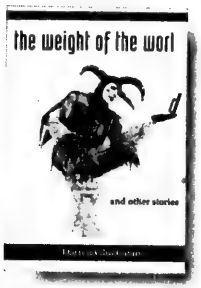
The Weight Of The World and Other Stories
by Darren Gluckman, Exile Editions Limited, 1999.

Gluckman's cool detachment and austere style may remind you of Kafka. However, Gluckman has more compassion, though he tries to mask it.



Usually, the situations are surreal – sometimes due to the characters' choices, sometimes not. At the same time, the tone is so matter-of-fact, so deadpan, that the surreal element comes as a surprise.

While there are fantasy tales here, other stories simply exaggerate everyday events and common character traits. Maybe over Dinner takes procrastination to an excess which would be funny, if the consequences weren't likely to be disastrous.

Gluckman's cosmos is riddled with gratuitous afflictions. In the title piece, the protagonist is suddenly, for no reason, burdened with the weight of the world. It ultimately crushes him, then shifts to someone else.

Some pieces are wistfully evocative, notably The Sudden Wife, where wayward desire leads to lifelong regret. Others, like Without Even Saying Goodbye, are deliberately, cheerfully callous. Actors, grounded in the gritty reality of aspiring artists' lives, is unabashedly vengeful.

Gluckman grasps the deep meaning of that worn-out word "alienation": lack of communication with others, and with oneself. The self-portrait fantasy takes alienation to a deadly extreme.

Is Gluckman's cool austerity a way of coping with life's "down side": a mask for vulnerable compassion, using detachment as protection against feeling too deeply? Let's hope he keeps the stylistic control, and drops the mask.

Zolf by Larry Zolf,
Exile Editions Limited, 1999

These articles, reviews and reminiscences span the decades from 1968 to 1999. They are sprinkled with unexpected puns, delightfully fractured idioms and mixed metaphors – and full of keen insights into what makes people tick and talk.

Zolf's irreverent perspective ranges from Canadian identity to his Winnipeg childhood to 1960s Amsterdam. This is contemporary history, seen through the eyes of an engaged, seasoned media personality who was once the enfant terrible of This Hour Has Seven Days.

The earlier pieces are timely today. Zolf's reviews of Easy Rider (1969), Midnight Cowboy (1970) and A Married Couple (1970), like his 1998 recollection of '60s Yorkville habitue Henri Borecki, revivify a past which is still helping to shape the present.

Zolf loves Canada, but not blindly. His insights into our public life reveal more than meets the TV camera eye. Canada: What the Brits Should Know (1981) shows that he's well versed in our national quirks and foibles.

His patriotism is rooted, deep and solid, in the liberty that respects his right to be a proud Jew. In O Canada, Oi Vey all the Way, as in Double Loyalty: the Sorrow and the Petty, he expresses his loyalties with critical, yet affectionate humour.

A piece like Portrait of an American Vigilante shows Zolf's ability to be fair, even sympathetic to opponents. Usually, he can understand what moves someone to hold an opinion, however vehemently he disagrees.

Zolf sees his own peculiarities honestly, with a humorous twinkle. When he writes of My Bulgarian Bombshell, he pulls no punches about being led astray (though it's obvious he enjoyed it).

He sketches his own background with vivid strokes like fragments of a novel you wish he'd write, as in Wallowing in Homelands. Recalling his father, Falk Zholf, he portrays a man who was as much a "character" as his son.

While he has kept his ideals, Zolf looks too close, and sees too clearly, to put people on pedestals – or under them. "Red Tory" sympathies neither stop him from puncturing the Nellie McClung icon, nor tempt him to demonize Conrad Black and Barbara Amiel.

Be it his older brother or John Diefenbaker, Zolf's portraits bring unique individuals to life. And the tribute essays, like the ones to Barbara Frum or J.B. Salsberg, show him as a man of deep loyalties. Read Zolf for these, even if politics bores you.

Memoir recounts survival as Christian in Nazi Germany

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Jewish Authors

David Makow, a retired research scientist at the National Research Council in Ottawa, has published Dangerous Luck, a memoir of how he, a Jew from Urdezow, survived the Holocaust disguised as a Gentile in a German work camp.

The book, whose full title is Dangerous Luck: Memories of A Hunted Life, was published in hardcover by Shengold Publishers of New York.

In his memoir, Makow clearly relates his experiences as a teenager in 1939, and the choices he was forced to make as the Nazis' fine-meshed net came down all around him. Central to his survival was his decision to flee into Germany itself, where he passed himself off as a Christian Pole named Miesczyslaw Wosko, and was put to work as a painter in the Lager Vogelgesang.

In this camp, he and another hidden Jew might be dangerous to be seen together often, we arranged our meetings discretely. We needed to be in touch, as there was nobody else we could trust."

But when the other Jew fled after his identity was discovered, Makow never heard of him again.

Unfortunately, another inmate also knew that Makow was Jewish, and said to him: "If you will give me your bread, margarine and cigarettes I will not tell anybody." After negotiations, Makow made regular payments of cigarettes to the blackmailer.

Fiercely anti-Semitic, many camp inmates supported the Nazis' efforts to incriminate him. Keeping his head, he always managed to throw off these suspicions.

Having a scientific bent, Makow was soon put to work as a mathematician and architectural draftsman. Sitting alone at a desk, he soon began to study English in secret. After three months of study, he suddenly began speaking to his Dutch friend, Otto, in English. "(Otto) was amazed," Makow writes. "He answered and I understood him. These were the first spoken English sentences I had ever heard and the first English words I spoke aloud to anybody."

On the morning of May 8, 1945, Makow and the other prisoners discovered that the German guards had fled and the camp was wide open. About a third of the book is devoted to the tale of his post-war survival, his marriage in Switzerland, his arrival in Canada and the establishment of his new life here.

work in the burgeoning field of radio astronomy. Moving to Ottawa, he soon designed and built a modest house for his family. At the NRC, he later worked on the application of ultrasound in medicine, new methods of aircraft safety, and other areas of scientific research.

In an epilogue, Makow waxes philosophical, asking the inescapable, albeit unanswerable, question, "Why did I survive?" Noting that our lives are unpredictably influenced by the actions of others, he writes: "It appears to me that life on earth is one giant interconnected organism, the destiny of each individual being interrelated to others in a random manner. The saying that a butterfly flapping its wings in Beijing causes a storm in Texas could apply equally well to our own lives."

At 120 pages, Dangerous Luck is a simple, well-told tale of survival and a valuable addition to our store of first-person testimony about the Holocaust.

PLO: no date for declaration of state

By AMIRA HASS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA CITY — Following two days of deliberations, the Central Council of the Palestine Liberation Organization decided not to set a date for the declaration of an independent Palestinian state.

Instead, the council authorized the PLO's executive committee and other bodies "to take the necessary steps to establish a Palestinian state and apply its sovereignty on the occupied Palestinian lands," and to submit a report on the progress that has been made, before Nov. 15 – the 12th anniversary of a symbolic declaration of statehood-in-exile – when the council will convene again.

In its final communique, the council twice asserted that Sept. 13, 2000 marks the end of the period for the Israeli-Palestinian interim agreement. However, it cautioned, this "does not exempt Israel from fulfilling all its obligations" under the agreement.

Although it had been expected that the council would defer the declaration of a state, the results of the vote reportedly irked Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat. Of the 114 council members who took part in the two-day meeting held in Gaza, 58 voted for the final resolution, 15 opposed it and three abstained. The 76 votes that were cast represented fewer than two-thirds of the 129-member council. Nearly 40 of those who attended the meeting left the hall or did not vote.

The measures to be taken by the executive committee include framing a constitution, drafting an election law and working toward Palestinian membership in the UN.

The eight-page document reiterated the main principles of the Palestinian position, calling on Israel "to withdraw from all the occupied Palestinian lands, including noble Jerusalem, to the borders of June 4, 1967."

The statement also reaffirmed the Palestinians' insistence on "full sovereignty in Jerusalem... as the capital of the independent state.

"The Palestinian people and the Palestinian leadership remain committed to the choice of peace as a strategic choice," the resolution said, "in order to achieve the goals of the Palestinian people [including] the right to self-determination and the right of return" of refugees.

The opposition groups – the Popular Front, the Democratic Front, the Islamic National Salvation Party (affiliated with Hamas) and the Arab Liberation Front (pro-Iraqi) – submitted a more assertive draft resolution. It declared that the interim period was over and that Palestinian sovereignty had to be realized.

In New York, a spokesperson for Prime Minister Ehud Barak called the move a positive step.

Poland criticizes disco near Auschwitz

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WARSAW — The Polish government has joined Jewish groups in criticizing the opening of a disco in a building near the site of the Auschwitz death camp.

"Places of amusement should not be situated at areas marked with the suffering of the inmates of former death and concentration camps," the government said, in a statement issued last Friday.

The government said it could not order the disco's closure because it is privately owned. But the government strongly urged its owners to move it to another place.

"The government will do all it can to see this is done under the existing legal order," the statement added. It did not say what this could involve, and a government spokesperson declined to elaborate.

The disco, which opened in August, is situated in the town of Oswiecim, about a mile from the former Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp where the Nazis killed nearly 1.5 million people, most of them Jews.

Authorities in Oswiecim consented to the disco at the time, saying the building was outside a zone where activities that could be offensive to the memory of concentration camp victims are prohibited.

But the disco is situated in a former tannery where the Nazis employed slave labourers and where luggage and clothes brought to Auschwitz by its victims were sorted.

In the years since the end of World War II, the former tannery buildings have been used as industrial plants, wholesalers and a shoe shop.

Jewish groups and others have protested the establishment of the disco, which is located next door to a German-run international youth meeting centre. The centre hosts young people visiting the Auschwitz camp and also hosts seminars and meetings on Holocaust-related topics.

Polish Foreign Minister Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, a righteous gentile and survivor of Auschwitz who heads the International Auschwitz Council, issued a statement saying he was "astonished" that the disco was approved "without consulting historians, and against the wishes of the provincial governor."

A group that has long monitored developments at Auschwitz, the Coalition for Jewish Concerns – Amcha, protested the disco during a demonstration earlier this month outside the Polish Consulate in New York.

Glenn Richter, an official with the group, said at the time: "The desecration of Jewish memory at Auschwitz is also the trampling of the memory of the many thousands of Polish citizens who died there, too. If you do not respect the martyrdom of others, you do not respect yourself."

The staff at the youth meeting centre also protested the disco, saying the noise disturbs the centre's activities and guests.

Arafat turns down Clinton

The problem, according to Barak, lies in finding the political will that would enable the advancement of a creative formula for defining sovereignty on the Temple Mount, as the concrete arrangements on the ground will not change. Barak objects to a partial agreement that would postpone dealing with the Jerusalem question.

In Barak's view, his visit to the Millennium Summit produced three positive results for Israel:

- Arafat will have to postpone the declaration of an independent state, originally scheduled for Sept. 13, as he has no international support for such a move.
- World leaders have recognized the great urgency in securing an agreement, as the window of opportunity is about to close. Once Congress adjourns, at the end of September, mobilizing financial aid for Palestinian refugees will be impossible.
- The third Israeli redeployment in the West Bank, as part of the interim agreement, is no longer on the agenda. Barak credits this to the fact that he insisted on the conclusion of the framework agreement with the PA prior to the redeployment and convinced the international community to abandon its demand for the Israeli withdrawal without a final settlement.

In his meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin, Barak drew a sketch of the Old City, the Temple Mount and the Western Wall in order to illustrate graphically the core of the dispute between Israel and the PA.

Putin asked a number of questions and Barak drew in the free-access road that he is proposing to build for the Palestinians between the village of Abu Dis, which neighbours Jerusalem to the east, and the mosques on the Temple Mount.

Barak said that "symmetry between the Western Wall and the Temple Mount" is out of the question, as the Western Wall is "absolutely, finally and unequivocally under Israeli sovereignty and the Temple Mount is the focal point of Jewish history."

The prime minister said Arafat was trying "to rewrite history and had made up a tale in which part of the Western Wall area belongs to his grandmother and his aunt."

Barak asked Putin to help Arafat "step through the decision-making door." Putin said that Russia would be pleased to help and immediately proposed that Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov join the mediation efforts of Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Another idea put forward by Putin was the convening of a summit meeting between Russia, the United States, Egypt, Israel and the PA. Barak made no response to this.

Biblical farming law creates modern controversy

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi was quaking with emotion.

In a meeting with President Moshe Katsav last week, Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron said, "I don't want to resign, but I am afraid they will excommunicate me."

The chief rabbi was explaining why he was buckling to pressure from the haredi community regarding an issue that springs from the Torah.

At issue were the biblical injunctions regarding the laws of shmittah, which holds that every seven years farmers in Israel must allow the land to lie fallow for an entire year.

The injunctions raise obvious economic problems for religious farmers, who find themselves unemployed for a year. Those who observe the laws of shmittah, which will be in effect when the new Hebrew year, 5761, begins later this month, refrain from buying local agricultural products.

For years, the issue has been the subject of religious controversy.

Haredi, non-Zionist Ashkenazi rabbis follow the Torah's shmittah regulations to the letter.

Sephardi rabbis, as well as Zionist Ashkenazi rabbis, circumvent the rule by using a "sale permit" under which farmers sell their land symbolically to a non-Jew for the sabbatical year. The move allows the farmers to continue cultivating the land – and customers to continue purchasing agricultural products.

This year, the two chief rabbis, as well as the spiritual leader of the haredi Shas party, Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, ruled that farmers could indeed use the "sale permit" and continue their work during the coming sabbatical year.

Their ruling conflicted with that of the leading authority in the haredi Ashkenazi world, Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv.

When Rabbi Bakshi-Doron gave farmers the green light to go ahead and work during the sabbatical year, the haredi newspaper Yated Ne'eman leaked threats that he would be excommunicated. He and his family were also threatened with ostracism, which would have meant that no member of the haredi community could have contact with them.

The threats prompted Rabbi Bakshi-Doron to meet with Katsav.

"This is a reality I cannot face," said the chief rabbi. "Neither I nor my family.

"Very important and dear-to-me elements have ruled against me," he said. "I am afraid of excommunication. I know what excommunication means, and I am afraid of it. I live within my people, and I simply cannot live with such excommunication."

Rabbi Elyashiv had also threatened that Rabbi Bakshi-Doron would no longer be recognized as a rabbi if he continued to support the "sale permit" ruling, which was originally handed down some 70 years ago by Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, one of the leaders of Zionist Orthodoxy.

Rabbi Bakshi-Doron felt he had no choice. Despite open support from Katsav – as well as from Prime Minister Ehud Barak, who called Rabbi Bakshi-Doron from New York last week – the Sephardi chief rabbi came out with a statement that gave the literal biblical interpretation of the haredi rabbis preference over the "sale permit" ruling.

His statement was perceived as a total surrender to the haredi community.

"This is yet another expression of an ongoing controversy between the haredi and Zionist rabbis," said MK Shaul Yahalom of the National Religious Party. The haredim are forcing their rules on the entire community, he added.

The controversy has far-reaching economic ramifications. The haredi rabbis had threatened to revoke the kashrut certificates of all grocery stores, restaurants and hotels that sold any agricultural products grown during the sabbatical year. The move could have cost farmers $5 billion.

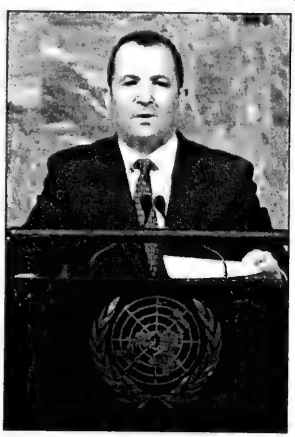
'No side can achieve 100% of its dreams if we are to succeed'

The following is the address given by the Prime Minister of Israel, Mr. Ehud Barak, on the occasion of the UN Millennium Summit at the United Nations, New York, Sept. 6, 2000:

Three millennia ago in Jerusalem, the prophets Isaiah and Micah kindled the torch of harmony and justice among nations: "...And they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks, Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." (Micah IV:3).

Towards Jerusalem, abode of God's Temple, Jews around the world have turned in prayer three times each day for 2,000 years, repeating the vow of their exiled ancestors: "If I forget thee O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget its cunning."

Jerusalem, the eternal capital of Israel, now calls for a peace of honour, of courage and of brotherhood. We recognize that Jerusalem is also sacred to Muslims and Christians the world over, and cherished by our Palestinian neighbours. A true peace will reflect all these bonds. Jerusalem will remain united and open to all who love her.



Ehud Barak

The opportunity for peace in the Middle East is now at hand, and must not be missed.

We envision a peace that will preserve the vital interests and the dignity of all sides. But no side can achieve 100 percent of its dreams if we are to succeed. My government has shown, in negotiations with Syria and the Palestinians, as well as in our pullout from Lebanon, that it can make painful decisions for the sake of peace. It remains to be seen whether our counterparts are also capable of rising to the magnitude of the hour.

The member states of the United Nations can lend a pivotal hand by encouraging the difficult process of reconciliation, and by opposing any unilateral measures, which may well spark a renewed cycle of violence and obliterate the prospects of peace.

I call out to Chairman Arafat to join me in this historic passage.

We are at the Rubicon, and neither of us can cross it alone. History will judge what we do in the next days and weeks: Were we courageous and wise enough to guide our region across the deep river of mistrust into a new land of reconciliation? Or did we shrink back at the water's edge, resigned to lie in wait for the rising tide of bloodshed and grief?

Fifty-five years ago, it took the shock of a second world war and the worst genocide to bring world leaders together to form this United Nations. In the name of the State of Israel, I commend Secretary-General Annan for so masterfully conceiving this summit, which powerfully declares our potential for solidarity.

More than ever, the borders of faith and culture have receded, showing us just how close we are in our hopes and fears, how little time each of us has on this planet, and how much we have yet to repair and heal. If we are brave enough to manifest the simple but profound truth – that the plight of individuals anywhere is the responsibility of leaders everywhere – we will be much closer to fulfilling those prophetic visions proclaimed long ago in Jerusalem.

May this historic meeting be a harbinger of hope for all humanity. May we muster the inspiration and the fortitude to bequeath to our children a better world, a brighter future, a more secure life. It is in our hands.

Deri goes to jail

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The man who galvanized Israel's working-class Sephardi community into a political force is serving a three-year jail sentence for taking bribes.

Former Shas party leader Aryeh Deri was surrounded by tens of thousands of supporters when he reported to a prison detention center on Sept. 3.

At a solidarity rally organized at the entrance to the Nitzan detention facility in central Israel, Deri told an estimated crowd of 15,000 to 20,000 supporters that he accepts the jail sentence with love.

"I tell you I will soon enter these walls with a happy heart because I accept with happiness the will of the Holy One, blessed be He," Deri told the crowd.

Aryeh Deri

Deri was ordered by Israel's Supreme Court two weeks ago to begin serving a three-year jail sentence for accepting $60,000 in bribes. The court had rejected his appeal of the conviction and a request to begin serving the sentence after the High Holy Days.

Deri has insisted he's innocent, claiming his conviction was ethnically motivated. In remarks on Shas radio stations the previous night, Deri reiterated his charge that he is the victim of persecution by the Ashkenazi, left-wing establishment.

"The ruling group had one sacred objective – to put Aryeh Deri in jail," he said.

Deri also claimed that "80 percent of the judges" and prosecutors are supporters of the left-wing Meretz Party.

This message was carried by Shas supporters at the solidarity rally. They waved signs reading "Free Deri" and "The Revolution Will Not Be Stopped."

In the skies above them, a counter-demonstration took place in the form of a motorized para-glider that flew over the rally, the words "Number One Thief" written on the sail.

Police were on alert for possible violence by Shas supporters. With the exception of some incidents of rock-throwing at police and journalists, the activists apparently heeded an appeal from leaders of the haredi party to act with restraint.

Deri's incarceration was a focal point for social tensions that have simmered throughout the summer. Reflecting the ongoing religious-secular rift in Israeli society, the conflict recently heated up over remarks made by Shas leaders about the Holocaust and attacks on the legal system.

This, in turn, sparked a secular outcry, including a call by some intellectuals for creation of a Shas-free, secular "New Israel."

In Jerusalem on Sept. 3, members of kibbutz youth movements held a pro-democracy vigil outside the Supreme Court building.

The tensions take place against the backdrop of Israeli coalition politics and the faltering peace process.

Shas pulled out of the government in July in protest over the Camp David summit, as well as what it termed as Prime Minister Ehud Barak's "humiliating" treatment of the party.

Critics of Shas counter that Barak had heeded most of the party's demands. They also note that as the third-largest faction in the Knesset with 17 members, Shas cannot try to present itself as a downtrodden political entity.

Some commentators have suggested that when two other right-wing parties pulled out of the government, Shas preferred not to risk the political uncertainty of remaining aligned with Barak and potential peace concessions that would be hard to sell to hawkish party supporters.

In the latest move connected with this issue, the Israeli Cabinet approved the dismantling of the Ministry of Religious Affairs and the distribution of its power to various government ministries and local authorities. Acting Religious Affairs Minister Yossi Beilin, who has proposed the idea, said it was intended to separate politics from religious services.

Deri's incarceration raises questions over the political future of Shas, which is divided by internal power struggles between those loyal to Deri and those to party's current leader, Eli Yishai.

The week in Israel

Sept. 4

• Prime Minster Ehud Barak told UN Secretary General Kofi Annan that Israeli-Palestinian peace talks must be concluded within a matter of weeks.

Sept. 5

• Israel ended its state telephone company's monopoly on domestic and Internet service. The move came just months before the government will divest its stake in the $5-billion (US) firm.

Sept. 6

• A court sentenced a Palestinian man to two life sentences plus five years for the murder of two Israeli women three years ago. The women, both in their early 20s, were stabbed to death while hiking in the Judean desert.

• In an effort to improve its public image, the Shin Bet domestic security service said it would appoint an official spokesperson and public relations consultant.

Sept. 7

• Two more people died from West Nile virus, bringing to six the number of fatalities from the infection during the past year.

Sept. 8

• A mistake in the movement of a support unit of the Duvdevan force, which took part in the operation at Assira Shimaliya two weeks ago, prompted a series of failures that ended with the death of three men by friendly fire and the wounding of a fourth, according to a report made public by Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz. Mofaz also announced that he was accepting the resignations of the head of the West Bank Division Brig.-Gen. Shlomo Oren, and Duvdevan Commander, Lieut.-Col. "Miki."

Iran 10 will wait even longer as appeals postponed

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – The waiting game continues in Iran, as the judiciary there has postponed, at least for another week, a decision in the appeals of 10 Iranian Jews convicted on charges of spying for Israel.

The delay is ostensibly because the three judges reviewing the appeals are divided on whether the charges the Jews were convicted of actually constituted a crime.

But few observers doubt that domestic Iranian politics are at play.

If anything, they say, the delay undermines the efforts by Iranian President Mohammad Khatami to spruce up his image as a reformer and to bolster his claim that he, not the Islamic fundamentalists, is truly in control of his country.

Khatami described the international outcry at the conviction of the 10 Jews as "disproportionate." Speaking to reporters last week after his speech at the UN General Assembly, Khatami also said his government would not intervene in their appeals, now being considered by Iran's judiciary.

But he did say he hopes the appeals "will be approached with the utmost justice" and "that nobody will be convicted beyond their actual guilt."

The delay also did nothing to defuse a flurry of street protest and behind-the-scenes diplomacy that greeted Khatami as he and 150 other heads of state arrived in New York last week for the UN Millennium Summit.

Jewish groups sponsored two media events just blocks away from UN headquarters, while an Iranian exile organization held a noisy anti-Khatami demonstration within earshot of visiting dignitaries from around the world.

"We cannot tolerate a situation where it is a crime simply for being Jewish," said New York Gov. George Pataki, who headlined the first street event on Sept. 5. The event was sponsored jointly by the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York.

"Mr. Khatami, to you, your Parliament and your judiciary, human rights and dignity must be the right of every citizen," said Pataki. "You claim to be a reformer. Show it and release these 10."

Convicted July 1, the 10 Jews have already served some 18 months in prison. Their sentences range from four to 13 years, but Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents, says his sources indicate that several more may be released, with jail terms reduced for the rest. But he wouldn't bank on it. As delaying the appeals decision demonstrates, said Hoenlein, "the only thing predictable about Iran is that nothing is predictable."

In related developments a revelation has emerged as American Jews and various governments lobby Iran to release the Iran 10: There may be more Jewish prisoners.

About seven years ago, 11 Iranian Jewish teenagers were arrested, allegedly for trying to leave Iran illegally.

They were reportedly found in border areas, perhaps indicating they were on their way out, said Hoenlein.

After a time, nothing was heard about them again, and the families presumed they had been executed. However, Hoenlein said a recently released prisoner from a Tehran jail revealed that he had spotted several of the missing boys.

They would now be in their mid- to late-20s.

Anti-Semites of the world unite, Duke tells Russians

By LEV GORODETSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

MOSCOW — A former Ku Klux Klan leader is spreading his anti-Semitic message across Russia.

But the real message is that there appears to be increasing co-operation between Russian extremists and their ideological counterparts abroad.

David Duke recently began his one-month trip to Russia by telling a crowd at a downtown Moscow museum that they should take action against "the Aryan race's main enemy – world Zionism" and that "the Jews have brought us to our knees," according to the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews.

Duke apparently came to Russia for a visit on the invitation of Aleksander Prokhanov, the editor-in-chief of Zavtra, an ultranationalist newspaper, and Konstantin Kasimovsky, the head of Russian Action, an organization known for its anti-Semitic statements.

Prokhanov, who is influential in nationalist circles and whose paper is heavily tainted with xenophobia and anti-Semitism, was invited recently to a meeting with Russian President Vladimir Putin and chief editors of some newspapers.

At the museum, Duke also called for all dark-skinned people to be forced out of Moscow. The crowd responded with cries of "Glory to Russia!" and "White Power!"

Micah Naftalin, the national director of a group that monitors anti-Semitic acts and other human rights violations in Russia, said Duke's visit was throwing the spotlight on Putin's flirtation with Russian extremists.

"Coming just two weeks after President Putin granted a meeting to Mr. Prokhanov, in effect legitimizing his anti-Semitic publishing activity, Prokhanov's open affiliation with a despicable character like Duke brings into even greater focus how wrong it was for the president to meet with him in the first place," said Naftalin.

This is Duke's second trip to Russia. Last year he met with Gen. Albert Makashov, a former Communist lawmaker known for his anti-Semitic statements.

In May, Jean-Marie Le Pen, leader of France's xenophobic National Front, visited Ukraine and signed a collaboration agreement with the Ukrainian National Socialist Party, a leading extreme-right organization in western Ukraine.

Lev Krichevsky, director of the Moscow office of the Anti-Defamation League, said extreme Russian nationalists are stepping up contacts with their counterparts in the West, including the sharing of Internet resources.

"It is amazing to see how fast these guys, with all their anti-Western rhetoric, find common language and organize multi-language Web sites together with their colleagues from the West," Krichevsky said.

Into the Arms of Strangers a superb documentary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It was a bright ray of light in a pitch-black universe.

In a nine-month period before the outbreak of World War II, Britain opened its doors to 10,000 Jewish children from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia. If not for this act of mercy, they may well have been murdered by the Nazis and their names might have been added to the horrific list of 1.5 million Jewish children killed during the Holocaust.

Mark Jonathan Harris has made a superb documentary about this uplifting rescue mission. Into The Arms of Strangers: Stories From the Kindertransport, which premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival last week, opens in local theatres on Sept. 15.

Told in the words of the child survivors, rescuers, foster parents and survivors, Into The Arms of Strangers is beautifully crafted and profoundly moving, a work which may yet earn Harris, the writer and director of the Oscar-winning The Long Way Home, another Academy Award.

Two hours long, the movie is essentially divided into three segments which flow seamlessly into each other.

The first part sets the stage, establishing the atmosphere of terror which forced Jews in Germany and Nazi-occupied Austria and Czechoslovakia to reexamine their lives in light of Hitler's accession to power.

The second episode concerns itself with Britain's humanitarian decision to admit the children and the agonizing, gut-wrenching scenes which attended their tearful departure without their parents.

In the final phase of the film, which resonates with high emotion, a number of events unfold. The children reach Holland, a safe haven on the journey across the English Channel toward Britain. They are placed with foster parents or in hostels. As they adapt to their new homes and guardians, they express longing for the day when they will be reunited with their parents.

Tragically enough, the vast majority never saw their mothers and fathers again. "Hope suddenly faded," recalls a woman whose parents were deported to Auschwitz. "Suddenly, the future wasn't there," laments another survivor.

Into The Arms of Strangers, narrated by the stellar British actress Judi Dench, begins on a sombre note with a visceral comment by one of the child survivors. "As old as I am, I'm still sobbing," she says, referring to the sudden and inestimable loss of her parents.

The film then shifts to the childhood memories of the survivors, most of whom live in Britain and the United States today. Lory Cahn recalls a wonderful shopping trip to a department store with her beloved father. Kurt Fuchel remembers the idyllic life his middle-class family provided. Lore Segal reaches back for a chilling recollection of streets suddenly filled with men in Nazi uniforms and plastered with red and black swastikas.

Their recollections are complemented by great film footage and newsreels of the era. We see the word "Jude" daubed in red paint on a Jewish shop window. We see vile anti-Semitic posters on walls. We see a synagogue burning on Kristallnacht, its roof engulfed in flames.

Beyond these graphic images, we hear stories which summon up the temper of the times. Jews, in exceptionally difficult circumstances, try without success to wangle foreign visas and exit permits. Nazi policemen bang on doors in the middle of the night, brutally awakening Jewish families. Plumes of smoke trail from a shul that has just been set alight.

Children leaving the Berlin train station in May 1939 – a scene from the superb film Into the Arms of Strangers.

It's clear from the film that Britain's decision to take the young refugees was a noble one, given that the U.S. Congress rejected a bill to accept 20,000 Jewish children.

In its infinite kindness, the German government allowed each child to leave with one piece of luggage and a total of 10 Reichmarks. The departures began in December 1938 and ended with the start of World War II. On average, the children arrived in Britain at the rate of 300 a week.

When one of the trains pulled across the Dutch border, a resounding cheer went up. There was a feeling of freedom in the air, one survivor recalls.

The reception they received in Britain was, by and large, positive. But there was a darker side, too. Some foster parents preferred young, blue-eyed, blonde girls, and still others misued the children as servants. Furthermore, the refugees over 16 years old were initially interned as enemy aliens.

Ultimately, the heroes in this film are the rescuers and the foster parents. Nicholas Winton, a London stockbroker, and Norbert Wollheim, a Berliner, were among the organizers of the kindertransports. Mariam Cohen was one of the guardian angels.

Into the Arms of Strangers commemorates their goodness and their heroism with exceptional skill.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

CURATOR TO SPEAK ON JEWISH PORTRAITURE

Norman L. Kleeblatt, the Susan and Elihu Rose curator of fine arts at the Jewish Museum in New York, lectures on the topic, "Rothschild, Wertheimer, Kahnweiler: Jewish Patrons and the Paradox of Portraiture" at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Wednesday Sept. 20, 7:30 p.m.

Kleeblatt discusses the emerging presence of Jews in European portraiture during the 19th century and the very early years of the 20th. Apparently, Jews began to appear in portrait paintings beginning in the Renaissance, but did not commission portraits by major masters until the Jewish emancipation of the 19th century. Now, Jewish portraits by Ingres, Renoir, Sargent and others are regarded as masterpieces.

Kleeblatt's is the first in a series of two lectures at the Beth Emeth on the theme "Art and Judaism," presented as the Sheva & Motek Fischtein Memorial Lectures. The second lecture, scheduled for Nov. 1, 7:30 p.m., is by Toronto arts lawyer Aaron Milrad on the topic Stolen Art and Holocaust Claims. Milrad is author of Artful Ownership: Art Law, Valuation and Commerce in the United States, Canada and Mexico.

Beth Emeth, 100 Elder St., North York. Discussion and refreshments to follow lecture. RSVP, 416-633-3838. Web site, www.beby.org.

Grow Old With Me: Gunther Plaut speaks on his book, The Price and Privilege of Growing Old, which provides insights on aging with a touch of humour. Refreshments, no admission charge. Israel's Judaica Centre, 897 Eglinton Ave. (1 block west of Bathurst). Sept. 17, 8 p.m.

Some Enchanted Evenings: Broadway Melody is a course for adults who enjoy singing along in a supportive group setting. No experience necessary; all ability levels welcome. Each session features numerous songs selected from the great Broadway composers and lyricists. Participants also learn some of the history of Broadway and its many colourful characters.

The 12-week course, led by Allan Price and Michael Leach, begins Sept. 18. The cost is $168; discounts apply for couples and groups. Holy Trinity Church, Thornhill (just west of Yonge St., south of Centre St.) 905-764-5695.

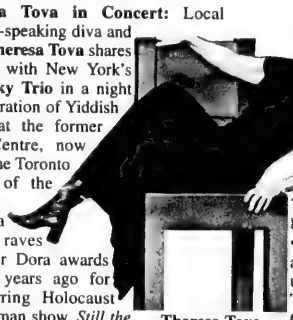
Theresa Tova in Concert: Local Yiddish-speaking diva and actor Theresa Tova shares the bill with New York's Waletzky Trio in a night in celebration of Yiddish music at the former Ford Centre, now called the Toronto Centre of the Arts.



Theresa Tova

Tova won raves and four Dora awards several years ago for her stirring Holocaust two-woman show, Still the Night. More recently, she appeared in a touring company of Ragtime (playing the role of Emma Goldman), and this summer in the much-lauded production of Fiddler On The Roof at Stratford.

She has also recently released Telling Stories, a new Yiddish jazz CD that features seven jazz and klezmer artists – tenor David Wall, and instrumentalists Mark Eisenman, Artie Roth, Martin van de Ven, Perry White, Daniel Barnes, and Steve Greenman.

The Waletzky Trio, which consists of composer-pianist Joshua Waletzky, violinist Deborah Strauss, and guitarist-mandolinist Jeff Warschauer, will likely perform some of the poignant compositions from their CD, Crossing the Shadows.

The event is produced by Myrna Levine, an ardent folk music and Yiddish enthusiast. Levine says she was inspired to present Theresa Tova and the Waletzky Trio in concert after she found herself moved to tears at performances by each. "If I like something, I want to share it," she explains.

Toronto Centre of the Arts, 5040 Yonge St. $40, $33, $25. Sunday, Nov. 19, 8 p.m. 416-872-8000.

Composer and writer team up with Outrageous results

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —A chance meeting brought together celebrated composer Joey Miller and award winning writer and lyricist Brad Fraser – with Outrageous results.

Not to be confused with the cult film of the same name starring Craig Russell, Outrageous is a new musical that's based loosely on the 1977 film. It is slated to run from Sept. 19 to Oct. 21 at CanStage's Berkeley Street Theatre.

"I met Brad Fraser on a train to Montreal," said Miller, 49. "He was with a mutual friend. We share the same agent, so we had met once briefly. We discussed his plans to mount the musical and he told me he was looking for a composer. I said, 'Here I am.' By the time I got back from Montreal there was a script waiting for me."

Having penned a number of hit musicals over three decades, Fraser thought Miller would be the perfect composer for his '70s style production.

Outrageous stars Thom Allison and Loretta Bailey. The musical is about two outcasts, Robin, a hairdresser and aspiring female impersonator, and his friend Liza, a schizophrenic.

"I use different music to set up each character," Miller explained. "They all have their own voice musically. I use distinct rhythms for each character borrowing from '70s rock, pop and theatre – sometimes the music collides and you get a really strange mixture.

"I walked into a rehearsal a few weeks ago, while the cast, under musical director Diane Leah, were singing one of the new songs. It sounded so amazing. I sat down and kvelled. Mostly, when [people] do a musical comedy, they resurrect Gershwin or take comedies that have familiar scores so people can anticipate the songs. In an original musical, people go in without any preconceived idea of what they are going to hear."

Joey Miller

Now a resident of Toronto, Miller attributes his career to his talented parents Sam and Sadie, who were devoted to producing original musicals for Montreal's Beth Zion Synagogue and the YMHA. Recognizing his musical talents as a boy, his parents encouraged him to try his hand at composing.

His first musical, Second Choice, was staged at the synagogue. Not only did he go on to a lucrative career in show business, but many of his parents' other discoveries made their mark in the entertainment industry, including television writers Mel Tolkin and Saul Ilson.

As a youngster, Miller played the drums and then went on to McGill University to study theory and composition. He also travelled to New York and Toronto to participate in writers workshops with Lehman Engel.

"I started making a living writing music in 1973," he said. "I was working with a gentleman named Dean (Closer Walk With Patsy Cline) Regan. I was his musical director for nightclub acts. Then, I met the late Frank Angelo. He became my manager and opened a few doors for me. He later went on to co-found MAC Cosmetics. I did music for MAC in-house videos. However, my first love has always been theatre."

After leaving Regan, he joined forces with Stephen Witkin and wrote a show called Eight To The Bar. It opened at the Charlottetown Festival and was such a success it was brought back for a second year.

That triumph led Witkin and Miller to the late John Hirsh. With Hirsh they created a musical called Flying. Flying was the first Canadian musical produced at the Royal York's Imperial Room, a spot usually reserved for cabaret acts. The owners of New York's Village Gate subsequently produced Flying in Atlantic City.

Other theatre credits include Ye Gods at the Charlottetown Festival's main stage, where Miller worked with Alan Lund; That Scatterbrain Booky, in which Miller won a 1991 Dora Award for Best Original Score; and Warbrides – A Musical at Halifax's Neptune Theatre.

His television work includes Booky, My Backyard, Stars on Ice, a Canada Day Special, the Juno Awards, and a Little Special (CBC). He has worked with baritone Michael Burgess and actor Al Waxman. His music has been recorded in both French and English.

Currently he is working with Frank Peppiatt re-writing a musical called Capone while future projects include composing the music and lyrics for Joy, a musical about depression that opens on Oct. 5 at the Workman Theatre Project.

Deterrence, art imitating life in near future

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to theCJN

The Democratic Party in the United States has recently nominated Joseph Lieberman as its candidate for vice-president. Should the Gore-Lieberman ticket win the election in November, he would be the first Jewish vice-president in American history.

Well the world of cinema has gone this one better. A new video, called Deterrence, is set in the near future at a time when the United States has its first Jewish president.

In the film, the president is visiting Colorado when a sudden snow storm cuts off all transportation and he is forced to take refuge in a small diner.

As luck would have it, this is the moment Iraq invades Kuwait once again, overrunning a small token American force stationed there and advancing on Saudi Arabia.

The United States has few armed units available to respond and the president threatens to vaporise Baghdad unless the Iraqis retreat.

Deterrence did not receive major theatrical release and it is easy to see why. All the action takes place in a small confined space and most of it revolves around the discussions between the president, his small group of advisors and the people present in the diner.

'Tis the green, green land of luck

By LEWIS ERIC LACHTER
Special to The CJN

DUBLIN — There are around 2,000 Jews living in Ireland today. Most of whom live in Dublin (the capital), Cork (in the south of the island/country), and Belfast (the Northern Ireland capital).

Did you know that the Jewish Museum in Dublin was opened in 1985 by the late, Irish-born, former president of Israel, Chaim Herzog? Did you know that his father was the first chief rabbi of Ireland and his home still stands in Dublin? Dublin also had a famous Jewish mayor. His name was Bobby Briscoe.

Another famous Jew, Leopold Bloom, James Joyce's world-known character in the novel Ulysses was "born" in Dublin. You can see his house on Upper Clanbrassil Street. There is an impressive statue of Moses in the city, and a Holocaust Memorial.

Is Ireland a good place to visit? The answer is yes, if you like green, green countryside, good food, friendly folk, and lots to do and see.

If you want to visit a synagogue, try the Dublin Hebrew Congregation on Adelaide Road. The shul was founded in 1892. Services are held on Friday at sunset, and on Saturday at 9:15 a.m. In Dublin there is also the Tenenure Hebrew Congregation, Machzekei Hadass Temple and the Progressive Congregation.

In Belfast there is the Hebrew Congregation on Somerton Road and in Cork, the Hebrew Congregation on South Terrace.

There is a B'nai Brith office in Dublin, a Jewish old age home and a mikvah. The office of the Chief Rabbi of Ireland and the Community Centre is in Herzog House at 1 Zion Rd.

Other interesting sites in town include the Weingreen Biblical Antiquities Museum in the Art Building of the famous Trinity College, Clonyn Castle, where over 100 orphaned children from concentration camps had a temporary home until 1948, and the Talmud Torah, which has a kindergarten, primary and secondary school.

There are Jewish cemeteries in Dublin, Limerick, Cork and Belfast. The Cork cemetery contains the graves of Jewish passengers from the Lusitania, which was torpedoed and sunk in 1916. The Limerick burial site was restored in 1990.

In Belfast, you will find the Communal Centre and the Botanic Gardens. The Gardens have a memorial honouring Daniel Jaffe (1807-1876), father of the Jewish Lord Mayor of Belfast, Otto Jaffe. In Cork, visit Shalom Park, which opened in 1989 in the area formerly known as "Jewstown."

The Maccabi Jewish Sports Centre is on Kimmage Road West in Dublin. The Jewish Golf Club is also located here.

The Chief Rabbi of Ireland is Rabbi Gavin Broder. You can find him at Herzog House in Dublin. The Israeli Embassy is also in Dublin on Pembroke Street.

Historically the earliest reference to Jews in Ireland is in 1077, when five Jews visited the High King of Limerick. Jews in Ireland today are primarily from Russia and Lithuania. Their families arrived in the Emerald Isle in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

To get an excellent picture of the Irish-Jewish community – past and present– visit Dublin's Irish-Jewish Museum in an area called Portobello.

Start your secular tour of Dublin by walking along Grafton Street, the town's most fashionable pedestrian mall. Poets, pamphlets and performers make the street vibrant. If you're looking for a more tranquil site, visit Dublin's favourite park, St. Stephen's Green, with its formal lawns, flowerbeds, fountains and sculptures of Irish writers and warriors.

The cultural quarter of Dublin, Temple Bar, is full of lovely boutiques, art galleries, pubs, restaurants, the Irish Film Centre and nightclubs. The former slum is now one of the liveliest sections of town.

Museum lovers will enjoy the National Museum on Kildare Street. The museum features prehistoric gold artifacts that date back to 2200 BCE. If you like afternoon tea, drop by the famous Shelbourne Hotel. You might rub shoulders with periodic visitors like Liam Neeson, Kevin Costner and Julia Roberts.

The secret of success according to an old saying is: "Look Irish, dress British, think Yiddish." If you want to see what the "Irish-look" is in its native habitat, visit green, green Ireland.

Deterrence, art imitating life

The film also poses a major moral question and it is interesting to watch how this dilemma is presented and resolved.

Kevin Pollak plays President Emerson and Timothy Hutton plays his chief advisor, Marshall Thompson. The supporting cast gives strong performances that heighten the suspense as the clock moves towards the moment of no return.

Another recent video release is much more entertaining and enjoyable than Deterrence. In fact, Train Of Life may be the best Holocaust comedy released in many years.

There is no question that Train Of Life is a comedy. In fact it is a film fable that might have been called Chelm Meets the Holocaust.

It's about a town fool who learns the Nazis are approaching and intend to deport the Jewish population. The village elders decide to meet this threat by purchasing a train, dressing some of their citizens in Nazi uniforms and pretending to deport themselves.

In reality, they would make their way across the Russian border and eventually travel on to Palestine.

All this is done in a slapstick comedic style that is absolutely hilarious.

Train Of Life was directed by Radu Mihaileanu, who has a strong Jewish background, was once a member of the Bucharest Yiddish Theatre and is a child of Holocaust survivors.

Forget about Life Is Beautiful or Jakob The Liar. Train Of Life is much better and it remains true to the real Jewish spirit.

Both Deterrence and Train Of Life are available on the Paramount Pictures Home Video label and should be available at most video stores.

Meeting group geared for depression sufferers

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Vancouver's Jewish Family Services Agency (JFSA) wants to dispel the myth that Jews are not afflicted by many of today's social problems, especially depression.

Selena Robinson, head of JFSA's counselling department, believes the marginalization many Jewish people have felt – and continue to feel – gives Jews a "we're not like them" attitude. This incorrect perspective leads people in the Jewish community to close their eyes to those suffering with mental health problems.

The JFSA hopes to remedy that with a new meeting group called Maor (Lightness): An Opportunity for Jews Living with Depression, she said.

"We tend to think that the problems we read about in the paper don't affect Jews," Robinson said. "Whether it's an issue of domestic violence, drug abuse or depression,we think it doesn't really happen in the Jewish community. And that's a total myth. If it were true, I'd be out of a job – and happily so," she said with a laugh.

Robinson is optimistic that enough interested people will come forward to make Maor a reality. Last year, there wasn't enough interest to get a group off the ground. This year, however, the number of JFSA clients who have requested such a group has risen significantly.

"Even if the group doesn't run, the fact that we're saying we know it's a problem is very positive," she said. "It's about getting people to talk about it. The fact is, Jews do commit suicide. We seem to know that depression is a real problem, but we don't talk about it."

Depression takes away a person's spirit. It can creep into one's life so slowly that some people don't even realize they are experiencing it. "All of sudden, someone can realize they haven't laughed in ages or they're feeling blah and hopeless. And then they can't remember a time when they haven't felt [depressed]," Robinson said.

"What we know from researchers," she continued, is that when people are in a group where different individuals are suffering the same crises… they feel better knowing that they are not alone.

"It restores confidence that they aren't so crazy. It breaks down barriers of shame and embarrassment that people feel when they are unable to cope on their own. It's our social responsibility to let them know that people with mental illness are still part of the Jewish community," Robinson said.

A key focus of Maor would be empowerment. "Oftentimes, [people] feel they should be controlling [depression] or overcoming it on their own. But it's much more complicated than that. We want them to feel they can still fully celebrate life. We want people to feel this is a place where they don't have to feel they should be in control of their depression," she said.

Psychiatrists, nutritionists and rabbis will speak to the group on a rotating basis, Robinson said. "We always look for Jewish professionals. They understand more about it, they know."

For more information, please contact the JFSA or Selena Robinson at 604-257-5151.

Hi mom! I'm (back) home

TORONTO — A television documentary called Home Again will take an honest, and at times, humorous look at families whose adult children are moving back in or have already moved back in with their parents, a phenomenon that has recently become widespread and is rapidly changing the nature of the Canadian family.

The latest Statistics Canada figures indicate that a rising number of adult children are living at home with their parents. Between 1991 and 1996, 23 percent of women aged 23 to 34 lived at home, up from 16 percent in 1981. During this time, the percentage of men at home rose to 33 percent, up from 26 percent. In the last decade, we have witnessed a growing shift away from leaving home early. The "cluttered nest" has eclipsed the empty nest.

Through four months of filming, three families will share with us their everyday lives, as they grapple with living together under one roof, again. The documentary will present the changing roles of the parents and the adult children and shed light on the hopes, dreams, fears and challenges experienced by the members of each household.

An experienced and caring documentary team will be producing this film for broadcast on TVOntario.

Home Again will be directed by Maureen Judge, the Genie Award-winning director of the documentary Unveiled: The Mother Daughter Relationship. She also directed the acclaimed NFB documentary And We Knew How To Dance: Women and World War I.

If you are moving back home, have adult children who have moved back in, or know people in this situation, please call Makin' Movies Inc. at 416-516-1833 and ask for Home Again.

NYGH opens new emergency department

TORONTO — North York General Hospital (NYGH) recently opened a $4.4 million emergency department expansion at the General Division (Leslie Street and Sheppard Avenue East), which will become the busiest single-site emergency department in Toronto.

The number of patient visits to the emergency department is expected to increase from the current 60,000 visits per year to more than 75,000. Much of the expected increase in patient visits is due to the conversion of the emergency department at the Branson Division into a community care centre to treat urgent medical problems. This change began on Sept. 11.

"Today, we are starting to see a lot of hard work and planning come to fruition. This is the first step in our expanded role to provide health services in north-central Toronto," says Ken Morrison, chair, board of governors, North York General Hospital.

"North York General is now ready to help ease the pressure on the system and handle the extra flow of critically ill patients who will be coming to us," Morrison says.

The emergency department is now equipped with 45 treatment areas spread over more than 15,000 square feet. Specialized care areas equipped with the latest medical monitoring systems have been created for critically ill patients, pediatric patients and cardiac patients.

To help care for patients in a more efficient and timely manner, all patients will be seen by a triage nurse before registering. Patients will also be able to benefit from a soothing environment created through the use of natural light, warm colours and open space.

Last spring, North York General Hospital received $3.1 million from the Ontario Ministry of Health to "fast-track" the redevelopment of the hospital's emergency department. The balance will come from the private sector through a combination of donations from private foundations, corporations and individual members of the community.

Soviet emigre has shot at Olympic swimming medal

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Millions of immigrants have flocked to the United States looking for streets paved with gold. Lenny Krayzelburg is searching for gold as well – but in a pool at the Olympic Games in Sydney.

Krayzelburg, who moved to the United States from Odessa, Ukraine in 1988, is one of several Jewish athletes from the former Soviet Union competing in this year's Games, which begin Sept. 15. Most are on the Israeli team but of the athletes from the former Soviet Union, Krayzelburg, who will swim the 100-metre and 200-metre backstroke, is the one most likely to win.

As an immigrant, Krayzelburg faces pressure beyond the opponents he must race in his events, he said.

"Your parents make a lifetime change. They had a pretty stable life back in Russia. We were financially well off. Here they make their life change for the betterment of their kid," the 24-year-old swimmer said shortly before leaving for Australia.

"As a child [you] want to become successful so that it was right for them to leave. It's definitely an extra incentive."

Working out his problems in the pool is something he was conditioned to do in the Soviet Union, where he was identified as a possible world-class athlete before he was 10.

As a star athlete, he was entitled to attend a special school with 44 other swimmers, where they combined classes with 12 hours in the pool each day.

"A lot of who I am today is what I learned back in Russia – the work ethic, the commitment. I attribute a lot of my success to what I learned" in the former Soviet Union, he said.

Even though he is swimming for the United States, Krayzelburg, described by The New York Times as "movie-star handsome," knows a lot of his friends and family in Odessa will be following his races with special interest.

Lenny Krayzelburg

By Soviet standards, his family was well off. His army-sponsored school gave him vouchers for free meals and the family lived in a three-bedroom apartment.

After the Soviets loosened economic restrictions during perestroika, his father, Oleg, opened a small, private business.

But anti-Semitic prejudice and the possibility that Krayzelburg might have to serve in the army when he turned 18 – perhaps in a war against Afghanistan – motivated his parents to emigrate.

"We saw the discrimination around us. If a Russian kid wanted to go to university, they cut the number of Jewish kids getting higher education. When you fill out the application for a job, they ask for your nationality and [when] they find out you are Jewish they try not to hire you," his mother, Yelena, recently told the Times.

After Krayzelburg immigrated to the United States, he faced a number of pitfalls, both in and out of the pool.

Finding a place to train was one problem. Learning English was another.

"When you don't speak the language, your hands are tied. It probably took me about four years to speak with people," Krayzelburg said.

His family struggled financially and in order to earn some money he worked as a lifeguard at the Westside Jewish Community Centre in Los Angeles.

Despite these difficulties, Krayzelburg eventually shone in the water.

He won the 1994 California state junior championships in the100-metre and 200-metre backstroke, setting a national junior college record.

At the 1996 Olympic trials, he finished fifth in the 200-metre backstroke. He owns the world record in both the 100 and 200.

He also earned a degree in finance from the University of Southern California.

Krayzelburg, who has a reputation as one of the hardest trainers on the U.S. team, tries to deal with the pressure by enjoying himself in the pool.

"I've kind of already proven myself. I just try to go out and swim well – and that puts a smile on my face," he said.

Russian athletes transform Israeli Olympic team

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Athletes from the former Soviet Union have transformed the Israeli Olympics sports scene.

About one-third of the Israeli team in the upcoming Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia – and five of the six strongest Israeli contenders – are originally from the former Soviet Union.

The team includes top favourites Michael Kalganov, a kayaker who holds two gold medals in world championship competitions in 1998 and 1999, and Alex Averbach, a pole vaulter who won the bronze in the 1999 World Athletics Championships.

The Games will run from Sept. 15 to Oct. 1.

Israel has only taken three medals in previous Olympics – a silver and bronze in 1992 for judo, and a bronze in windsurfing in 1996.

The immigrants have relied on the training methods and dedication that they learned in the punishing climate of the Soviet sports machine.

"The Russians brought their training techniques and a discipline and seriousness that we did not have in Israel before," said Golan Hazani, Olympic sports correspondent for Yediot Achronot, Israel's biggest daily newspaper.

Ronen Hillel, spokesman for Israel's Olympic committee, agrees: "Immigrants have made a very important contribution in coaching and training. They have brought high-level coaching techniques that lifted our athletes to new levels."

The Olympics will also offer a unique opportunity to accelerate Israel's acceptance of immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

Although many native Israelis harbour negative stereotypes about these immigrants, nobody doubts that when they don blue-and-white on the Olympic field or medal stand, Israelis will cheer with no qualms.

Still, immigrant athletes in Israel have found themselves under a scrutiny about their identity that veteran Israelis would not likely face.

In a news conference last week, after declaring he was shooting for the gold medal, pole-vaulter Averbach was asked whether he has learned the words to Hatikvah, Israel's national anthem.

"When I win the gold at Sydney," he said, "you'll hear how I can sing."

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I started school a couple of days ago and I really don't like it. I was split up from my friends and put into a class where I don't have any friends. The people in my class aren't nice or welcoming to me. They don't even talk to me. I see my friends at recess, but it's not enough. I don't like being the "loner" in my class. What should I do?

Lonely

Dear Lonely,

You mentioned that none of the kids in your class talked to you or made any efforts to be friendly. But have you tried talking to any of them?

It is important to remember that those same kids probably feel as nervous and uncomfortable around you as you do around them. Try to gather up your courage and go over and make conversations with them.

Most people like making new friends. They will probably be delighted to have you as a new friend too. Just remember that if you like yourself, other people will like you too. Also, remember to smile.

Karilani is actually three girls in high school. The drawing is a fiction. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

The Campaign For Our Children

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives

This coming Super Sunday-Super Week, September 17-21, is among the most important five days in the communal calendar. Several hundred dedicated UJA FEDERATION volunteers will be phoning homes across the Greater Toronto Area on behalf of Campaign 2001 – The Campaign For Our Children. But your call is actually coming from thousands of kids whose future depends on the additional dollars we raise.

It's coming from hundreds of youngsters exposed to abuse in their own homes. From 7,000 Jewish children living below the poverty line in the Greater Toronto Area. And from young adults, like Sonya Nutov who, with UJA FEDERATION support, moved to a promising future in Israel alone, leaving her parents behind in Kishinev.

The UJA FEDERATION Campaign For Our Children is a special initiative to raise $45 million – four million more than last year – to help young people at risk and bring them closer to Jewish life. Please respond generously when your UJA FEDERATION volunteer contacts you next week or donate securely on line at www.jewishtoronto.net. The success of this urgent campaign depends on you. Iran may free some Jewish captives

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Some of the 10 Iranian Jews sentenced to jail terms for spying for Israel may be freed and others may have their sentences reduced, according to the Jewish community's official representative in the Iranian Parliament.

Speaking in Persian to some 400 Iranian Americans in Los Angeles during Saturday morning services at the Eretz Cultural Centre, Maurice Motamed said the trial had shattered the dignity and respect of Iran's 25,000 Jews and had increased Jewish emigration from the Islamic Republic.

Motamed's 10-day visit is part of Iran's attempt to persuade the American government to lift economic sanctions against Iran, particularly in regards to Iran's oil resources, sources told JTA.

Motamed said the lifting of such sanctions would benefit Iran, and by extension, the country's Jewish community, these sources said, referring to private conversations they had with Motamed.

Tehran apparently believes that if the Iranian Jewish community could be persuaded to lobby for the lifting of sanctions, it would persuade the general American Jewish community to do likewise. The broader community, in turn, would convince the White House and Congress.

Others may have sentence reduced

While the scenario may appear simplistic and unrealistic, the Iranian government's belief in unlimited Jewish clout in Washington may prove helpful to the Jewish community in Iran, one source commented.

A report that Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi will visit Los Angeles and meet privately in the coming days with local Jewish leaders in the Iranian-American community lends some credence to this understanding of Tehran's intentions.

Most Jews to live in Israel in 2080: report

By GAYLE HORWITZ
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Migration to Israel is expected to almost double the country's Jewish population to 10 million by 2080.

Meanwhile, the number of Jews living in the United States is expected to drop by a third – to just 3.8 million. Worldwide, the number of Jews is estimated to rise slightly during the next 80 years – eventually hitting 15 million.

These projections are at the core of a new demographic study of world Jewish population trends that was published this week in the American Jewish Yearbook 2000, published by the American Jewish Committee.

The article, Prospecting the Jewish Future: Population Projections, 2000-2080, predicts future Jewish population trends in the

Israel welcomes one of its strongest supporters

Although he is president of one of the smallest populated countries in the world, President Leo Falcam of Micronesia (left), seen here reviewing the troops alongside Israel's President Moshe Katsav, is a very welcome guest in the Jewish state. Despite the frequently automatic votes condemning Israel in the General Assembly, Micronesia has always risen to Israel's defence. Falcam said he will always remember that Israel was the first non-Asian country to recognize Micronesian independence in 1986. Prior to that date the country was a U.S. protectorate. [Israanet photo]

The News in Brief

CANADA

Now It's a Church

VANCOUVER — A Jews for Jesus-type messianic "synagogue" has been removed from the local Yellow Pages' listings of synagogues. The Kehillath Tsion Messianic Congregation had been listed under "synagogues," until Canadian Jewish Congress complained to the company that publishes the book. In this year's book, the congregation is listed under "churches."

UJA Allocations

CALGARY — United Jewish Appeal allocations for the 2000-2001 fiscal year have been set, based on the likelihood that $1.35 million will be raised. This is seen as a conservative estimate, as the 1999-2000 campaign raised nearly $1.47 million. After various campaign costs and the 25 percent allocation to national and overseas needs are deducted, $926,625 would be left for local needs.

ISRAEL

Sabbath Buses

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak plans to add several hundred Sabbath bus lines as part of his planned secular reforms. The Israeli daily Ha'aretz quoted a senior official as saying some 300 bus lines would be added to the 400 already in operation, in an effort to help single parents, the elderly, immigrants and others who do not own private vehicles.

Lesbian Ruling

JERUSALEM — Israel's attorney general will decide whether a rabbinical court can prevent a lesbian from meeting with the biological children of her partner. Israel's High Court of Justice sought the attorney general's opinion while considering a petition submitted by the Association for Civil Rights in Israel on behalf of a lesbian couple that received an order issued by a rabbinical court after the ex-husband of one of the women sought the ban.

Barak Criticizes EU

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Barak criticized the European Union's decision to lift the sanctions it imposed on Austria after the extremist Freedom Party joined the country's government in February. Barak said last week that the sanctions should continue as long as a party with "neo-fascist tendencies" remains in the government.

Zaglembians Gather

TEL AVIV — The Zaglembie World Organization is holding an intergenerational, worldwide gathering for survivors and descendants of the Polish town of Zaglembie, once a centre of Jewish life. The program, from Oct. 16 to 19, will include trips, ceremonies, a day-long conference and a gala event at a major Tel Aviv hotel. All Zagliembian descendants are invited to attend in order to keep alive the memory of the town. For information, call 011-972-3-527-0919.

WORLD

Money for Disco?

WARSAW — A local Polish official has asked for money to help move a controversial disco located near the former site of the Auschwitz death camp. The mayor of the town of Oswiecim made his appeal to a delegation from the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. The money would go to compensate the owners of the disco, he said.

'Yes to Christ'

VATICAN CITY — A top Vatican official says in an upcoming book that the Roman Catholic Church hopes Jews will someday embrace Christianity, according to the German magazine Focus. The book by Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger says that "Catholics don't want to impose Christ on the Jews, but they are waiting for the moment when Israel too says yes to Christ."

Shoah a 'Hoax'

DAMASCUS — The English-language Syria Times newspaper recently published an article denying the Holocaust took place and claiming it to be a "myth" invented by Jews. The article claimed that Israelis who held senior posts in the newly created Jewish state had collaborated with the Nazis.

Olympic News

SYDNEY — Australian officials last week confiscated bulletproof vests and holsters from Israeli security agents when the Israeli team entered the Olympic Village here for the summer Olympic Games. The incident followed months of discussions about security at the Games. Meantime, a Web site is featuring Jewish athletes participating in the Games. The site, www.jewishsports.com/jewsin/olympics.htm, features links to some of the athletes' own home pages.

Leader Holds Austria's Feet to Fire

VIENNA — In February, Austria announced plans to rapidly resolve all Holocaust restitution claims against it.

European Union sanctions against the country for including a far-right party in its new government lit the fire under Vienna.

But with the EU's announcement last week that it has lifted sanctions against Austria, some wonder whether the wheels of restitution will, coincidentally, grind to a halt.

The president of Austria's 6,500 Jews, for one, intends to keep the nation's feet to the fire.

Ariel Muzikant was in Washington this week for the fourth round of negotiations among representatives of Jewish groups and the Austrian and U.S. governments.

In May, Austria agreed to pay $395 million to roughly 150,000 former slave and forced labourers.

That is small change compared with what negotiators for victims are pursuing now: "tens of billions of dollars," said Muzikant, for property stolen from Austrian Jewry, which numbered 200,000 before World War II.

Austria has reportedly countered with an offer of $150 million, an amount Muzikant described as "a joke."

Toronto artists take top prize in Judaica contest

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An Italianate, baroque-inspired Torah mantle designed by two Toronto artists has captured top honours and a prize of $10,000 (US) in a prestigious international Judaica art competition sponsored by the Chicago-based Spertus Museum.

Temma Gentles and Dorothy Ross collaborated on the winning entry, which Ross describes as "a representation of an Italian baroque bridal gown." Both artists plan to attend a gala dinner at the Spertus on Sunday, Sept. 24, at which the winners will be formally announced.

Inaugurated in 1994, the Philip & Sylvia Spertus Judaica Prize Competition is held every two years to encourage artists to work in Jewish ceremonial art.

The latest competition, which specifically called for the design of a Torah cover or mantle, attracted 115 entries from nine countries, including the United States, Canada, Israel, Belgium, Italy, Mexico and the United Kingdom. Winners and finalists were chosen by a panel of three "blind" jurors.

By a remarkable coincidence, another Toronto artist has taken the second prize of $3,000. Suzy Tanzer, who fashioned a Torah covering from "silk and linens that belonged to my mother and my husband's grandmother," also plans to attend the Sept. 24 ceremony in Chicago. (The $2,000 third prize went to Sylvia Kleine-Borger of Schwelm, Germany.)

"They have really high standards at the Spertus, so I was honoured just to be among the finalists," says Tanzer, a textile artist who recently completed an ark curtain for the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in North York.

Gentles and Ross collectively put in a total of about nine weeks' work on their prize-winning mantle, which presents three layers of fabric. The innermost is "all white and lace," Gentles says. "You can get a glimpse through it to the Torah, the way you can with a bride."

The next layer is a sort of dress and the outermost a sort of cloak. A large round pendant represents a pomegranate, onto which are sewn the images of three crowns and four seeds, representing the Jewish patriarchs and matriarchs respectively. Overall, the patterns are rich, the beadwork and stitching elaborate, the imagery and symbolism striking.

"It's a very very elegant piece, and very luxurious looking," says Susan Youdovin, the museum's curator of education. "Yet it transcends the physicality of its beauty and enters a more spiritual realm. This transcendence is very important. It is not just beautiful for the sake of being beautiful. It is beautiful for a purpose."

Integral to the artists' joint vision was the concept of hiddur mitzvah, the beautification of an object to encourage fulfillment of religious commandments.

The Mountain of God

From the editor's desk

Even his name – Emmanuel Anati, alliterative, cadenced, flowing – evoked strength and stalwart confidence, a foreshadowing, of sorts, of the engrossing, nearly lyrical recounting of his lifestory and life's work that, over the course of an enchanting evening in his home in a small village in the hillside approaches to the Italian Alps, would hold his two Canadian visitors spellbound and send shivers up and down their spines.

"We found evidence [of the story of the exodus from Egypt] far beyond Mount Sinai. We found traces of the Hebrews in Egypt. We found evidence of the 10 plagues. We found things that were quite shocking. Our work reveals that the Bible is a reliable history told by metaphors. The modern commentators who deny that the Bible could be historic are not doing anyone a service. They are going to be proved wrong."

Anati is a scientist, an archeologist. He was speaking about a special project – the Har Karkom archeological survey – on which he has been actively working for some 20 years but which was first conceived some 26 years earlier in 1954.

Har Karkom, meaning Mount Saffron in Hebrew, is a low-lying mountain in the south-eastern Negev desert that rises not quite 500 metres above sea level. Despite its humble height, the mountain dominates its surroundings and can be see for many kilometres from all directions.

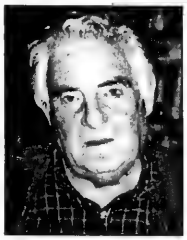
Anati believes, and has believed ever since the results of his first dig on the mountain in 1980, that Har Karkom is the true Mount Sinai of the Bible.

To date, he and his team of scientists have surveyed nearly 1,200 archeological sites in the area. His discoveries have led him inexorably to conclude that Har Karkom was considered by the peoples of the region, even earlier than the events of the Exodus, in the paleolithic age, as a "holy mountain."

"There is something in this mountain," Anati resolutely tells his visitors. "There is electricity here. I have visited a thousand mountains, and always came back to this one. It always stayed in my mind."

He speaks in elegant English, calmly, slowly, his words penetrating his guests' wide-eyed curiosity and ricocheting all along the path of taut nerve endings. The visitors could almost feel their hair standing on end. The moment was magical.

Anati's findings, however, are not without controversy. Based on his findings, Anati concludes that the exodus must have occurred approximately 1,000 years earlier than has hitherto been assumed, that is, not in the second millennium BCE around the 13th century, but rather in the late third millennium BCE.



Emmanuel Anati

Anati "debates" other archeologist/theologians and eloquently propounds his theories in a number of journals and texts.

He has published more than 50 scholarly articles on Har Karkom. The most recent book on the subject is Les mystères du mont Sinai: Har Karkom, Bayard Editions; it updates his research to 1999. In 1993, he published a booklet titled Har Karkom In the Light of New Discoveries, Centro Camuno di Studi Preistorici. In 1986, he published The Mountain of God, Rizzoli, New York.

Each year, fittingly enough around the holiday of Passover, Anati returns to Har Karkom with a team of 40 persons to continue his research on and about the mountain. The archival material is catalogued and housed in the Centro Camuno di Studi Preistorici, which Anati founded and of which today he is its executive director, in Capo di Ponti, Vallecamonica, in the region of Brescia, Italy

The Centre is the only such institute/resource centre/museum/place of higher learning and advanced study of its kind anywhere on the planet. The region's prehistoric art attracts students who are art historians, historians of religion, anthropologists, archeologists, semioticians as well as those from other related disciplines. The Centre's findings have been placed by UNESCO on the list of World Cultural Heritage.

Anati is also one of the world's preeminent experts on prehistoric rock art. He is a distinguished scholar from a distinguished line of scholars and creative thinkers.

His mother's family, Castelnuovo, itself prominent in the history and community of Italian Jewry, extends to Amedeo Modigliani. His father's family includes Enrico Fermi.

Anati was born in Florence, the eldest of four brothers. After the Nazis seized control of Italy in 1943, he fled with his parents, grandmother and siblings into the forests of the Chianti region.

When the war was over, the four Anati boys and their mother set sail for Palestine.

He has studied at the Hebrew University, Harvard, the Sorbonne and Oxford and has worked in the fields of four different continents. Until last year, upon his retirement at the age of 70, he was professor of Palaeo-ethnology at the University of Lecce.

Like precious silk threads that could never be separated, Jewish history and northern Italy had intertwined, yet again.

Last of a 5-part series. —MBD

Day meets privately with members of community

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day met privately with members of the Jewish community at a local synagogue last week.

It was the latest attempt by Day to court the support of the Jews in Toronto. Last June at Beth Jacob High School for Girls, Day's team held a membership rally at which they claimed to have signed up 400 members of the Jewish community to the Alliance.

Day met about 100 people, all of whom appeared strictly observant, in an unpublicized meeting at the Village Shul on Eglinton Avenue West.

The gathering was also a fund-raiser for the Alliance. Those in attendance paid $1,000 each. Among the guests on hand was industrialist Albert Reichman.

A sign in the shul's lobby read: "Toronto Jewish Alliance honouring Stockwell Day."

A CJN reporter who attempted to cover the event was told to leave.

Organizers stressed it was a private, invitation-only function. Larry Zeifman told The CJN the meeting was called to discuss "issues of concern to the Jewish community. Anyone can call their MP and have a private meeting."

Many Jewish voters are keeping a close eye on Day because of the right-wing views associated with his fundamentalist Christian beliefs.

Addresses 'issues of concern'

But some Jewish voters are attracted to the new Leader of the Opposition. Day has gone on record as saying he believes that Ontario's policy of funding Catholic schools but not other faith-based education is unfair, and that Ottawa could correct the imbalance.

He has promised to change the income tax provisions to provide a full federal tax credit to parents of children attending private Jewish day schools for the amount of tuition paid to the schools.

The CJN's follow-up calls to organizers the next morning were not returned.

Kolel celebrates holidays at new location

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning will be holding its first High Holy Day services at its new location at 151 Eglinton Ave. W.

The services, led by Rabbi Neal Loevinger, director of outreach, are learning services, and "are an opportunity to understand the structure, meaning and flow of the High Holy Day experience," says Rabbi Loevinger.

Rabbi Neal Loevinger

Throughout the prayer service, he says, he will "weave stories, songs, discussions and demonstrations, exploring the texts, the Torah readings, and the unique rituals for the Days of Awe."

The service is especially appropriate, he says, for those reconnecting to their Jewish heritage, those who wish to become more familiar with Jewish prayer, and those who may be choosing Judaism and are in the midst of the conversion process.

The service will contain fewer prayers than a regular service, but participants will be given the chance to ask questions. "The whole idea is for everyone to understand exactly what is going on in the service," says Rabbi Loevinger.

To some people, he says, the whole idea of attending a service can be overwhelming. "We want to make people feel safe. We want to introduce them to prayers that satisfy them emotionally and intellectually."

It is "extremely exciting," he says, to be holding these services in the new building. "To have Jews learn, discuss and pray together is what Kolel is all about. We want to help people connect to Judaism as adults."

Services in support of Kolel, and sponsored by the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism, will also be held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, led by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel; and at 20 Grosvenor St., led by rabbinical student Nadia Siritsky. For more information call Kolel at 416-485-7007.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Ride fund-raiser for Matti

TORONTO — More than 60 motorcycle enthusiasts from the YOW (Yidden on Wheels) Motorcycle Touring Club held a three-hour ride, in memory of slain Toronto teenager Matti Baranovski, on Sept. 10.

Baranovski was the 15-year-old Toronto high school student who was brutally murdered on Nov. 14, 1999, in G. Ross Lord Park. A bright, compassionate young man, he had attended several rides with his stepfather, Elliott Korczak, who is a YOW club member.

Matti's mother, Olga, officially started the ride at the Lipa Green Building.

The day was proclaimed Matti Baranovski Ride for Youth Day by Toronto City Council and Mayor Mel Lastman.

Proceeds will provide scholarships for participants in UJA FEDERATION's March of the Living program who require financial assistance. The March of the Living is an international educational project that brings Jewish high school students to Poland and Israel for two weeks every spring in an effort to learn more about Jewish history and the Holocaust.

The event raised $30,000 through corporate sponsorships, donations and a silent auction, said program chair John Komlos. It "exceeded all our goals."

If followed, a formula that works

Last week, the first ministers of this country arrived at an agreement regarding the funding and the delivery of health care services nationwide. The ability of the premiers and the prime minister to settle their differences took many pundits by surprise. It was felt by those same pundits that regionalized priorities and local pressures, in particular those articulated by Ontario and Quebec, would hold back the hands of those premiers from signing on the proverbial dotted line.

But pundits are often wrong. And politicians do occasionally set a proper example.

In the end though, the politicians saw the sharks of discontented public opinion beginning to circle the shaky skeletons' island they had dredged for themselves. They therefore turned the page on their scripted posturing and found sufficient common ground on which to stand together, triumphantly dispersing the sharks to the tuneful accompaniment of cameras flashing, video tapes turning and the silent miracle of microphones carrying the proof of their triumph to relieved constituents from coast to coast.

The substantive merits of the agreement cannot be assessed in this space. One hopes that the funds, new and old, will be used in an effective, efficient, wise manner.

The fact of the agreement, however, is to be commended.

On the day after the accord, the media reconstructed the key moment of agreement. It hung in the balance of give and take between the two opposing positions: the federal government's insistence on a national reporting/evaluative mechanism and the Ontario/Quebec refusal to abide such a mechanism.

And, as events proved, the fulcrum on which the balance finally settled, was compromise. In Canada it has ever been thus: rather than pointing a finger, extending a hand.

For one premier, however, Lucien Bouchard, the sharp triumph of the hour had to be blunted somewhat and his willingness to compromise explained for the separatist ideologues grinding their teeth back home. So he sheepishly offered: "This was not about federalism. This was not about the sovereignty of Quebec. This was about health and the capacity of people acting in good faith to reach settlement for the benefit of their citizens."

The objective of the accord may indeed have been about health, but its method was also indeed about federalism.

Thus, in his transparent attempt to diminish and circumscribe the formula that led last week to success, Premier Bouchard actually prescribed it: "acting in good faith...for the benefit of [all] citizens."

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Decries segregation in year 2000

Yediot Achronot (Sept. 1) published an article with the absolutely unbelievable title, "In one classroom, they are all Ashkenazim, in the other, only Sephardim."

Almost 50 years ago, on Feb. 24, 1956, Rosa Parks, a courageous black woman sat in the "White only" section of a bus in Montgomery, Ala., thus defying the U.S. segregation laws. In South Africa, in August 1989, F.W. de Klerk in South Africa started dismantling apartheid, one of the most despicable human institutions. How, then, could the headmaster of a public religious school allow segregation in his school in the year 2000 in Israel? The headmaster's answer was that the Ashkenazi parents left him no choice when they threatened to withdraw their children from Yavneh and register them in a private school.

Whatever the reasons for this most regrettable rekindling of the Ashkenazi-Sephardi hostility of the time of the ma'abarot, why should innocent young children, from the Sephardi, as well as the Ashkenazi communities, be made to pay for their parents' quarrels, be forbidden to sit together in the classroom or play together in the playground? Why should they unknowingly be used to perpetuate such hatred?

To segregate people according to a component of their identity – religion, skin colour, country of origin! Sound familiar?

Today, are not children born in Israel just Israeli Jews? How long will the "country of origin" matter?

The incident in Yavneh is an aberration. It is an isolated case. But does that make the pain any less for these children and their families?

Decries actions of Pope

I am a Christian. My faith is in my brain, in my heart and in my soul. Nobody persuaded me to become a Christian, except God.

Now, take a six year-old child – steal him from his own family – baptise him when he has no idea of what's happening, and make him the "son" of a pope (Pius IX) – who is forbidden to beget his own children but may, with impunity, kidnap someone else's. How could John Paul II not be bothered by any of this? Rather, he intends to ennoble the pope who condoned the kidnapping, declaring him a capital "S" Saint. That is ludicrous! It's disgusting – a series of sins against God and an insult to all moral people. Even to name Pius IX in the same breath as John XXIII is offensive and an indication that John Paul II's judgment is substantially impaired. Next he will glorify Pius XII if no one intervenes. I say, "Shame!"

Shame on anyone who condones or facilitates such irresponsible actions. Shame on those who know it is wrong but say nothing. Everyone who loves the Lord should be speaking out. Habakkuk would. Jeremiah would – at any cost. My Jesus would be toppling tables at the Vatican! Solomon warned: "Whoever says to the guilty, 'You are innocent,' peoples will curse him and nations denounce him." (Proverbs 24:23-24)

Decries CJN's editorial decision

I would like to ask the editor what editorial would appear in the CJN under the following circumstances.

Suppose a renegade Catholic priest in Poland had claimed that "Germans were snakes and God regretted creating them" and then proceeded to point out that the "Jews who perished in the Holocaust were not Jews but Catholic sinners who had died and this was part of their eternal damnation."

Further suppose that a Polish Canadian newspaper had devoted a full page to allow a local priest to vindicate the renegade in Poland. Of course, Rabbi Immanuel Shochet is entitled to his views, but it seems to me to be an error to devote a full page in The CJN (Sept. 7) to his defence of the indefensible.

Explaining tuition increase

In your news item, in the Sept. 6 issue of CJN, on Tuitions in the Toronto Jewish Day Schools, you mentioned a steep increase of 11 percent in the tuition at The Toronto Heschel School (THS). This was mentioned in comparison to increases in the other day schools, without commentary or explanation. As a result, your readers may have received the impression that you are comparing apples with apples and that the cost of tuition at the THS is extraordinarily high for the same offerings as elsewhere.

The unmentioned difference is that The Toronto Heschel School maintains the lowest student-teacher ratio of all the Toronto Day Schools, providing classes of 18 to 22 students (depending on the grade), with two certified teachers in each class at all times. This is more than double the teacher power of the other schools. In addition, The Heschel School offers a full student services department, with a school psychologist and special education staff, a unique kind of arts education with specialists in visual arts and in music (including the Orff method). The tuition levels need to be considered in the light of these services. One may actually wonder how all this can be provided at a tuition level which varies only slightly from those in the other elementary day schools.

Perspectives

The Holy See and the chosen people

The CJN asked two renowned thinkers to comment upon the current attitude of the Catholic Church towards the Jews.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin

"Go to the end of ... time, the continued preservation of the Jews will be a proof to believing Christians of the subjection merited by those who, in the pride of their kingdom, put the Lord to death."

These words of Saint Augustine (354-430 CE) served as the basis for the traditional Christian perspective on Judaism. According to this somewhat paradoxical theology, the Jews are part of a divine plan. They wander the earth like the original murderer, Cain, doomed to powerlessness and exiled from their land, reminding the world of the horrendous punishment that is meted out to people who kill God.

Rabbi Martin Lockshin

Yet, just like Cain, the Jews were not to be killed. They were to be kept alive as testes iniquitates suae et veritatis nostrae – witnesses to their own sinfulness and to "our" (i.e. Christians') virtue.

Not all that long ago, St. Augustine's attitude was still the reigning theological position of the Roman Catholic Church. The Vatican's refusal to recognize Israel was widely understood as a function of the Pope's unwillingness to accept the existence of Jewish power. I remember my rabbi, in an impassioned speech from the pulpit in 1964, making fun of Pope Paul VI who visited the "Holy Land" without ever entering "Israel" or getting his passport stamped.

Against this background, the events of this last year have been impressive, even startling. The current Pope did what no other pope would have contemplated: he made an official state visit to Israel, met with Israeli government leaders, had an audience with chief rabbis and visited Yad Vashem, the Kotel and many other holy Jewish sites.

The picture of the Pope standing at the Kotel is a dramatic visual reminder that St. Augustine's theology has finally had its day. But it is only one of many changes in the Catholic Church that have taken place in my own lifetime.

Just 40 years ago, it was official Catholic dogma that even contemporary Jews were responsible for the killing of Jesus (as the simple meaning of Matthew 27:25 implies). This dogma was changed in the early 1960s. The Church also eliminated from the liturgy prayers that described Jews as "perfidious." (Anyone familiar with a conservative religious tradition, such as, for instance, Orthodox Judaism, should be impressed that liturgical changes of this nature could be made.)

Catholic spokesmen, including the Pope himself, have recently expressed their regret for the inaction and indifference of many Catholics during the Holocaust. Such statements have fallen short of what many Jews would like to hear. But it is wrong to argue that they are worthless or self-serving. The Pope has risked weakening his position among his more conservative supporters by appearing to be a philo-Semite. He must be respected for that.

The most profound change in the Church in recent times is that Catholics no longer target Jews for conversion. Many Christian groups do, and the strengthening of efforts by evangelicals to tempt Jews away from their Judaism is alarming. But the "facts on the ground" show that it is not the Catholics, but other Christians, who are energetically encouraging Jews to become apostates.

The greatest dangers to Jews today are the physical threat from militant Islam and the spiritual threat from fundamentalist Protestants, who display great love for the State of Israel, but who also work tirelessly to convert our children to Christianity.

Is Christian supersessionist philosophy – the claim that Christianity has updated and replaced old-fashioned, outmoded Judaism – so ingrained in the Catholic world-view that we Jews can never be true partners with Catholics? Probably. Do Catholics still demonstrate insensitivity to Judaism, as in the recent move to beatify Pope Pius IX, an outspoken anti-Semite? Doubtless.

But the question is not "Where are they now?" but "In what direction are they going?" Judging from the past 50 years, it seems Catholicism is going in the direction of respect for Judaism and rapprochement with Jews, and at a surprisingly speedy pace. The Church has performed many acts of tshuvah (repentance). Especially at this time of year, we Jews should recognize that and hope that the process will continue.

Rabbi Lockshin is chair of the Division of Humanities and an associate professor at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

Rabbi Avi Weiss

Most observers of Vatican-Jewish relations have focused exclusively on Pope John Paul II's pronouncements and apologies to the Jewish community. But the Pope's carefully-chosen actions are, in fact, a reflection of fundamental theological differences that still remain between the Catholic and Jewish communities.

Take, for example, the photo that appeared on front pages throughout the world during the Pope's visit to Israel. Pope John Paul II is captured looking toward the hills of Jerusalem from Mt. Nebo, where the book of Deuteronomy states that God showed Moses the land of Israel.

Rabbi Avi Weiss

Within this photograph lies a central distinction between Judaism and Christianity. For Jews, Moses looked at the land wherein the Jews would settle in accordance with Torah law. For Christians, Moses is the forerunner to the coming of Jesus, who would establish a new covenant with God.

This theological distinction lies at the very root of Israel's and the Vatican's differing views on Jerusalem. With minor variations, Israelis are united in the sentiment that Jerusalem should remain the eternal, undivided capital of Israel. This, however, is a position that is theologically unacceptable to the Christian community, as it would allow the Jews, who – according to Christianity – are the people of the Old Testament, to be in control of the spiritual centre of Israel.

Other theological differences shed light on the Pope's attempt to apologize to the Jewish people. In Christianity, the basis of repentance is admission of guilt. In Judaism, while admission of guilt is important, it is only the first step – the basis of repentance is not words but deeds. An act of restoration is required. Hence, the great Jewish philosopher Maimonides argues that authentic repentance is when a person is faced with the same challenge wherein he or she failed, but this time does not make the same mistake.

The words of the Vatican to the Jewish community concerning the Holocaust are most welcome. Still, they are not enough. After all, the Pope has just granted sainthood to the notoriously anti-Jewish Pope Pius IX, and is still seriously considering sainthood for Pope Pius XII – the very pope who was in power during the time when the Church turned its back on the Jewish people. Nor has the Vatican allowed a full investigation of its policy to help leading Nazis flee after the Holocaust to South America and elsewhere.

Of course, the Pope can never apologize for sins committed by the Vatican during the Shoah as that would implicate Pope Pius XII – such an admission would undermine the Church's doctrine of infallibility. Jews hold by a tenet that insists that its leaders, including the High Priest, are vulnerable and can make serious mistakes.

Even within the Pope's spoken words of apology concerning the Crusades and the Inquisition, uttered before his visit to Israel, he has fallen short. In Christianity, general declarations are enough. In Judaism, Maimonides insists, repentance requires a detailed description of what one has done wrong. In his words, one states: "I have sinned, and have done thus." The Pope's description of some of the Church's errors was not described in the detail required for true repentance.

Thus, the Pope's contention, during his visit to Israel, at Yad Vashem for the "need for silence" rings hollow. Victims have the right to remain silent, but those who stood by silently during the Holocaust must speak with clarity about their wrongdoing. For Maimonides, the articulation of the wrongful act committed is a necessary catharsis for true repentance to take place. Through verbalization, the sinner is forced to come face to face with the evil that has been committed.

There is one other difference. In Christianity, all sins can be forgiven by God. In Judaism, that would only apply to sins committed against God.

Concerning sins committed against our fellow person, only the victims – not even God – can offer forgiveness. Thus, the Pope's attempts to apologize for Catholic sins committed during the Inquisition and Crusades fall short, as the victims of these atrocities are not here to forgive. So while an apology has value, true forgiveness cannot take place.

While significant steps have been taken to improve Catholic-Jewish relations, much more must be done. I must recognize that the barriers yet to be overcome relate to how the Jewish approach to tshuvah – repentance – fundamentally differs from the Christian one. Rather than list a litany of what the Pope has or has not said, it behooves us to recognize that Christians and Jews come from a different theological base. And it is these differing theologies which will continue to define the parameters of our relationship into the foreseeable future.

Rabbi Avi Weiss is the senior rabbi at the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale, New York, and national president of the Coalition for Jewish Concerns – Amcha. He is the founder and dean of the new, modern Orthodox rabbinical school, Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, in Manhattan.

Myths of Jews involved in black slave trade

From time to time we read about anti-Semitism in the black community of North America. To a significant degree, it arises from the oft-repeated "fact" that Jews were deeply involved in and largely responsible for the slave trade. This perception was promoted in a book by Stanley Elkin, who in 1959 published The Secret Relationship Between Blacks and Jews. Until recently, no full-length study had appeared to expose the true historical facts, but more recently two such studies have made their appearance: one by Eli Faber, titled Jews, Slaves and the Slave Trade: Setting the Record Straight; and another by Saul R. Friedman, titled Jews and the American Slave Trade.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

These studies should contribute to laying the canard to rest. They show that Jews played virtually no role in the development of the original slave trade, which had its origin in Britain. Only 1.6 percent of all the stockholders of the British South Sea Company, which carried on a major part of the 18th-century trade, were Jewish. In 1758, there were no Jews among the many merchants who belonged to the terribly cruel but financially successful Company of Merchants Trading to Africa.

Not only did Jews not participate as merchants and financiers in England, they were also conspicuously absent from the large number of ship owners and captains. By 1726, Britain's slaving fleet had grown to at least 171 ships, capable of carrying about 60,000 slaves, and all of the vessels were owned by non-Jews.

There was a small Jewish component in the slave trade centred on Barbados and Jamaica. There, at the beginning of the 18th century, Jews owned only 0.8 percent of the total. The major exceptions to the non-participation in the slave trade were two Jewish merchants from colonial Rhode Island. But even their immoral enrichment was but a small percentage of this sorry enterprise.

In fact, it might well be asked how it came to pass that so few Jews over such a long time did not participate in what was undoubtedly a very successful commercial undertaking that stretched over several hundred years. I would like to think that Jewish tradition had something to do with it. While in biblical times slavery was a fact of life and had nothing to do with race, Jewish tradition made every effort to meliorate it, and as time went on, the Jewish custom turned against this terrible practice. Jews themselves were enslaved in Egypt, and in the course of time, developed a deep aversion to the whole idea of bondage.

The next time you hear the slavery canard spoken of, remember that there are the above-noted two excellent sources that contradict it. We are not a people of saints, but slavery has not been a notable Jewish sin.

The Olympics and Israel

Like most of the world, Israel is currently in the grip of Olympic fever. For two weeks, hundreds of millions of people around the globe are glued to TV sets, taking in the ultimate showcase of excellence in international sports. But in Israel there is an added dimension to the event. Elsewhere others can simply enjoy the Olympics for the quadrennial jockfest they're meant to be. Israelis can't. Not unless their memories go blank and they suspend their sense of history.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

True to what is so often the case with many other events and places, Israelis can't just approach the Olympics at face value. Here, unlike in most countries, the Olympics are not simply a massive athletic spectacle and marketing juggernaut. For Israelis – and most Jews in the Diaspora – the Olympics resonate with painful echoes.

When Israelis think of the Olympics, two major episodes are indelibly etched in their collective consciousness. Both will forever cast dark shadows over the original lustre of the Olympics. For most Israelis, the mere mention of the Games automatically activates a rewind button in the mind, unleashing highly charged images from 1936 and 1972. They evoke two of the most traumatic chapters for Jews in the 20th century – the Holocaust and Palestinian terrorism.

In 1936, three years after coming to power in Germany, Hitler hosted the Olympic Games in Berlin. Despite Germany's already well-established anti-Semitic policies (including barring Jewish athletes from competing for Germany), the international community decided to ignore calls to boycott the Games, rewarding Hitler with its participation. His Nazi regime exploited the Olympics to impress the outside world with the illusion that his dictatorship was not so bad after all. With the conclusion of the Games, the Nazi persecution of Jews intensified, culminating in World War II and the Holocaust.

In the worst tragedy ever to befall the Games, Palestinian terrorists murdered 11 Israeli athletes and sporting officials in Munich in 1972. For Israel, the Olympics would never be the same.

Even today, the fallout from Munich persists in Israel. Every September, especially in Olympic years, the media commemorate the slain Olympians. Last week, just before the Sydney Games opened, Israeli television broadcast during prime time a full-length documentary film on the Palestinian attack and the botched German operation to rescue the Israeli hostages. It made for chilling viewing. A few days earlier in Tel Aviv, in sombre contrast to the festive preparations in Sydney, relatives and other mourners took part in an annual memorial ceremony before a statue at a public square dedicated to the victims.

At the same time, in yet another reminder, albeit an indirect one, Australian media reported that police confiscated special security equipment from Israeli guards accompanying the Israeli team in Sydney. Not surprisingly, ever since Munich, Israel has been acutely sensitive about Olympic security.

All this is not to say that Israelis can't also sit back and enjoy the world's greatest sports event. They do, and this time around they have more reason to watch.

This year, Israel sent its largest contingent to the Olympics with the hope that one of its 39 athletes will bring home the country's first-ever gold medal. It also deployed its biggest media squad at an Olympics. Israel Television alone dispatched a team of 30 to Sydney to cover the Games with an Israeli flavour.

Many Israeli viewers are looking more closely at the entire framework of the Games, both on the field and behind the scenes. For the first time, Israel is toying with the idea of presenting an official candidacy to the International Olympic Committee for Tel Aviv to host the 2012 Summer Games.

To that end, Mayor Ron Hulda'i has set up a committee to examine the possibility of a government-backed bid to the IOC, which will pick a host in 2005 for the Games seven years later.

Too bad Tel Aviv's chances are considered slim. How fitting it would be to give Israel the nod given what happened in Munich and Berlin.

Ties that still bind

With the growing population of Jews in Israel (now about five million), and the assimilation and low birthrates in the Diaspora, in a few years, the majority of the world's Jews will be Israelis. In many ways, Israel is already the centre of intellectual, religious and cultural activities. For better or worse, the vehement debates and periodic confrontations over the future of the Jewish people are taking place primarily in Israel.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

From the outside (and also up close), the tribalism in Israel between secular and religious, Sephardim and Ashkenazim, hawks and doves seems too deep to bridge. The militancy and politicization of haredi rabbis alienate Reform, Conservative and even many modern Orthodox Jews in the Diaspora, while, from the opposite perspective, the efforts to redesign Jewish tradition are anathema.

However, if these events are put into the perspective of history, this process does not appear as ominous. After 2000 years of exile, the Jewish people has suddenly regained its sovereignty, freedom and the ability to choose its destiny. With so many opportunities, cultural legacies and interpretations (all claiming to be the only genuine expression of the Jewish heritage), the exuberance of this process is often overwhelming. At the same time, the Diaspora has lost its primacy, and Jewish leaders are being confronted with a very different reality.

Hidden in this process is a renaissance of tremendous proportion. Questions include the ways in which the Jewishness of the Jewish State is to be expressed, as well as the nature of the new relationships with the Diaspora and the non-Jewish world. Should Israel, as a sovereign Jewish society in the Land of Israel, embrace the principles of Halachah (Jewish law), including the rules governing the sabbatical year (shmittah) and Sabbath observance of state-owned businesses such as El Al, despite the economic costs involved? Or should Israel be a "state of all its citizens," with only a symbolic Jewish veneer, emulating western liberal democracies, with primary emphasis on individual equality for all citizens, including the Arab minority?

For most Diaspora Jews, the questions and debates surrounding these issues are often hard to follow and seemingly irrelevant. Indeed, this is a symptom of the growing separation between the two components of the nation. Fifty years ago, when Israel's survival, as well as that of the Jewish people, was uncertain, and the nation's identity was still amorphous, Diaspora Jews identified completely with Israel's struggle. Despite Zionist pretensions of leadership, Jewish power and resources were still concentrated in the Diaspora. The Zionist vision has since been realized, and Israel is the centre of the Jewish world.

In this rapidly changing and highly charged environment, it is increasingly difficult to identify ties that bind us into a single community. And yet, as in the classic dysfunctional family, the fact that we argue about these issues so passionately also shows that our shared heritage and mutual identification remain intact. On Rosh Hashanah, the prayers and sounding of the shofar are expressions of that shared heritage and basic sense of unity. The Land of Israel and Jerusalem maintain their historic and religious centrality, whether symbolically for Diaspora Jews, or more tangibly for Israelis.

The changes that are taking place, in both Israel and the Diaspora, are also indications of hope for the future. Leaders now realize that without serious Jewish education programs and efforts to combat assimilation, their communities will soon disintegrate. Instead of concern with "individual fulfilment," emphasis on the importance of community identity is increasing.

In Israel, there are some signs that the older generation which harbours many narrow, divisive dogmas, ideologies and personal passions, will soon be succeeded by a more confident and flexible leadership. In this Internet generation, the walls that have separated religious and secular, as well as Ashkenazi and Sephardi Israelis, are slowly being replaced by a more tolerant and inclusive cultural style. These changes will take time to spread to different sectors of society, but the trend has started.

German women find spiritual fulfilment

Sibylle Arendt, Gabriele Hannen and Monika Hebbinghaus are inextricably bound by a common spiritual link. Two of these German women share a love for Judaism, while the third thirsts for Jewish knowledge – all in a country where Jews were persecuted and murdered by a hateful Nazi regime.

Sheldon Kirshner in Germany

Arendt, 47, is a Berlin psychotherapist who was once a teacher. Tall and slim, with close-cropped black hair, she exudes an aura of strength and fortitude as well as vulnerability.

Sixteen years ago, after her father's death at 67, she rummaged through his desk, and stumbled upon a family secret. "I found papers," she recalled. "I was shocked."

She discovered that he was a Jew. For reasons best known to himself, he had concealed his Jewish background from his three children, though not from his Christian wife.

Raised as an atheist, but nominally a Protestant, Arendt did not have a good relationship with her father, a doctor who found refuge in the Soviet Union during World War II and returned to Germany after 1945.

Although she cannot put it into words, she always suspected that he had withheld an important truth about himself. "He never spoke about it," said Arendt, referring to his Jewishness. And her Russian paternal grandparents, with whom she lived before her father passed away, also maintained a silence about the family's Jewish origins.

Nagged by a gnawing suspicion that Jewish blood flowed through her veins, Arendt went to Israel in 1981. "I felt very much at home there," she said. She returned to Germany, determined to reclaim her Jewish roots. "I wanted always to be a Jew, but I thought it was an illusion. I was convinced that there was no way to be Jewish."

Her path to Judaism was cleared by a London rabbi, an empathetic woman who persuaded Arendt to follow her dreams. "She told me, 'If you want to be Jewish, do it.' "

Arendt, who is single, heeded the British rabbi's advice. She immersed herself in Jewish texts and studied Hebrew, albeit realizing that she had embarked upon a difficult road. "The decision was easy, the way was long."

About a year ago, an Orthodox rabbi in Berlin converted Arendt. Today she is a new person. "I feel liberated as a Jew. I am healthier, and inside, I am happier. I have found a kind of identity. I was missing something, and now I have found it. I feel like a whole person. I feel peaceful and right."

Arendt's younger sister, 50, was supportive of her conversion. Her brother, 43, is still coping with the emotional fallout. Arendt did not discuss her mother's reaction.

Now that the full weight of her Jewishness has sunk in, Arendt, whose Hebrew name is Channah, is thinking of activating an old plan of leaving Germany and studying at a woman's seminary in Jerusalem. She is searching.

Gabriele Hannen's route to Judaism has been a circuitous one.

She is a thoughtful 35-year-old multi-media producer from a traditional Roman Catholic family in Munster.

In 1993, while writing a thesis on Catholic theology and grappling with Hebrew at the University of Munster, she was drawn to Judaism and began attending services at a synagogue in Munster. "The first time, I felt uncomfortable. I couldn't follow the prayers. But I liked it and went back again and again. I liked the music, the chazzan, the Hebrew language, the whole combination."

Faced with something of a mid-life crisis, she quit divinity school in 1994, a year after separating from her husband. Steeping herself in a Jewish milieu, Hannen worked at a Jewish museum in Essen and at the Institute of Jewish Studies at the University of Duisburg.

Four years ago, she made contact with an Orthodox rabbi in Switzerland. Under his guidance, she lived as an observant Jew. She kept kosher, refrained from driving on the Sabbath and mastered the rules and rituals of Judaism. During this period, she formed a relationship with an Orthodox Jewish man, but broke it off last year after deciding that Orthodoxy was too rigid for her.

Early in 1999, Hannen settled in Berlin, where she met two Jewish men who have had a deep and lasting influence on her.

Rabbi Walter Rothschild not only introduced Hannen to members of his synagogue, but he and his Dutch-born wife facilitated her entry into the Jewish community. "From the first minute, I was comfortable with him," she said.

Thanks to Rabbi Rothschild, Hannen met Bernard Lerner, a 43-year-old property manager and a Berliner whose parents are of Polish and Russian Jewish descent. Subsequently, she moved in with him.

Last May, Rabbi Rothschild, a Briton from Leeds, started a conversion course, and Hannen joined about 20 other would-be converts in the class. She is close to finishing the course, and expects to be converted as a Conservative Jew any time now. Once she has overcome that hurdle, she and Lerner will exchange marriage vows.

Gabriele Hannen

Hannen's parents are hardly thrilled. "They're very Catholic and can't understand how I can leave the community. They are a little sad, but not angry. Before they met Bernard, they had never met a Jew. But they are good and friendly people, and like Bernard."

Born in Munster and living in Cologne, Monika Hebbinghaus, 28, is a freelance broadcast journalist who regularly files stories about Jewish subjects.

When she was 11 or 12, she was touched deeply by a story about a Jewish girl coping with racism in Hitler's Germany. "That's when I realized what it must have been like to be a Jew in Nazi times," she said.

Monika Hebbinghaus

Nevertheless, until she was a teenager, Hebbinghaus never discussed the persecution of German Jews with her mother, Maria, or with her father, Richard, a Wehrmacht radio operator in North Africa during World War II.

In 1988, when she was an exchange student in Texas, she was asked to deliver a paper on the Holocaust, a topic she was first exposed to as a tenth grade student in Germany. Two years later, she visited Auschwitz with a German-Polish friendship group. It was, she recalled, "a disturbing and intense experience."

While studying film, theatre and English literature at the University of Cologne, she took a course in American Jewish literature, and wrote an essay on Saul Bellow's novel, The Victim.

During the summer of 1999, she acquired a diploma in Jewish studies from Oxford University. She studied Hebrew, Yiddish, modern Israeli history and the Holocaust, and won an award for an essay on Jewish ghetto writers.

Although she can carry on a simple conversation in Hebrew, she is rusty with the language. "I may need a refresher course." She thoroughly appreciates Yiddish. "It is as an earthy language that gives you a sense of the people and of shtetl folk."

At Oxford, where she was one of four Germans enrolled in the course, she met her current boyfriend, Gregor. He is an aspiring PhD candidate in German-Jewish history.

"My interest in Jewish issues really stems from my German identity," she explained.

She is not the only person in her family with an affinity for Jews and Jewish matters. One of her unmarried sisters lives with a Russian-Jewish immigrant, and her mother is quite interested in Jewish issues.

As a German, she believes that Germany can never remove the stain of the Holocaust from its history. And while she accepts "collective responsibility" for Germany's crimes, she rejects the concept of "collective guilt" and the notion, propagated by American historian Daniel Jonah Goldhagen in his book, Hitler's Willing Executioners, that Germans were driven by a brand of "eliminationist" anti-Semitism."I don't know how he can justify this theory," she said indignantly.

Though she does not consider herself a sheltered person, she has never overheard an anti-Semitic conversation in Germany. And she is frustrated, powerless and sad when vandals desecrate Jewish cemeteries.

The idea of Holocaust denial – a criminal offence in Germany – repulses her. "I have never talked to a person like that."

She hopes that Jews in Germany can rebuild a vibrant community where they can feel comfortable and safe. "This would mean," she said, "that Germany is an open and democratic state."

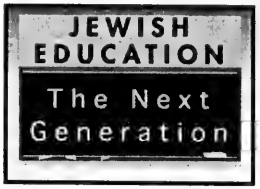
Jewish Life

High Holy Day services

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Education, Mark Twain once quipped, consists mainly in what we have unlearned. For a great many Jews today, shul is a kind of ponderous opera taking place in a foreign tongue that they desperately wish to unlearn. Depending on the opera house in question, the always well-dressed patrons sit in stony, uncomprehending silence or continuously interrupt the performance with a rowdy mirth that attests to the inconvenience of self-restraint. One who wishes to cling to any remnants of the sacred must, like a well trained spy, commit to forgetting all he has seen.



But as poet and author Mark Strand elegantly muses, "In a field I am the absence of field. Wherever I am/I am what is missing." In our synagogues we struggle mightily, with words and ceremonious pageantry, to grasp at the absence of God and bring Him into our impoverished souls. Surrounded by our indifference, or what is worse, our ironic escape from Him in the guise of our attachment, God can be found missing in places designed to radiate His presence.

We turn prayer into a perilous and often frustrating adventure by allowing a continuous stream of unceasing talk that pervades every corner of the sanctuary. At times, the crescendo is so loud as to make one want to scream "Enough. Everyone go home and let us face our Maker alone in shamed silence!"

Our children see through it all and call the bluff on the emptiness of the enterprise. As they roam the hallways of our shuls during davening, we profess sadness and disappointment that they are not inside with us. Why would they want to be? Children watch as their parents talk during every facet of the service. They reason correctly that more interesting and expansive conversations could take place outside, a steely logic that shines its light on our eroded sense of mission.

For some, the rabbi's sermon is the theatrical highlight, the soliloquy upon which the morning's utility depends. Looking to be entertained or simply lulled into a feeling of inchoate seriousness by noble sentiments and stylish prose, they see the success of the program as contingent on the well-turned phrase and momentary distraction of wit. It is a commodity to be purchased with the entrance ticket.

As Rosh Hashanah arrives, the innocent onlooker who quests for Divinity is paralysed into ruefulness: "Why am I here? And how did I arrive in this place? And what is its purpose? What is there for me as I try to strip away 'the rubbish of summers/the black-leaved falls'?" One yearns to find a single genuine moment in the presence of God. A moment with no past. No future. No talking. No parade. No ornately crafted words. Nothing on display, nothing bought or sold or negotiated. Silence. Shofar blasts. Silence again as the heart wends its long long path to emotional truth and spiritual dignity.

Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav once noted that if I am no better tomorrow than I was today, then of what use is tomorrow? May God bless us that we use our time, which grows shorter with each passing year, very wisely. For who knows when the chance to improve tomorrow will one day, in the blink of an eye, run out?

'Use the good dishes,' live for today

Use the Good Dishes* by Dr. Elaine Dembe, Macmillan, $19.95

When, in a speech, Elaine Dembe, author of the popular book Passionate Longevity: 10 Secrets to Growing Younger, advised the audience to "use the good dishes," they responded with laughter and applause.

Several months later, she wrote a poem with that phrase as a title and sent it to a radio station. When it was read on the air there were 200 requests for copies; more than 500 copies of the poem were sold in poster form.

Now, at the age of 50, and a practicing chiropractor for 23 years, she asks the question: "How can we find joy in everyday living?" The answer is presented in eight chapters that deal broadly with these themes: adapting, being, unburdening, remembering, playing, exploring, giving and celebrating.

She explores the lives and emotional experiences of numerous people – some of them well-known personalities such as Deepak Chopra, June Callwood and Dr. Robert Salter – but most of them ordinary members of the community, friends, neighbours and caretakers.

What emerges from the interviews and multiple points of view is a kind of map for baby boomers "who are now ready to journey on a more insightful path."

Dembe emphasizes that we must accept life with all of its unforeseen difficulties, pain and loss. She welcomes the wisdom of psychiatrist Dr. Lawrence Ballon, who explained, "We think that bad things shouldn't happen to us when people fall ill, and say, 'Why me?' I say, 'Why not you? Who is it supposed to happen to?' It happens to all of us. We must learn to accept the difficult times of our lives. People think that accepting what is means being passive. Acceptance is really embracing your situation realistically."

June Callwood, well-known Toronto journalist and author, never adapted to the loss of her son who was killed at 20 by a drunken driver. She indicated, "I have missed him every day of my life for the past 17 years." But what she did was create Casey House, a Toronto hospice, to help with those with AIDS, and named it for her son.

How do people find joy in everyday living? Their responses are, for the most part, simple, uninvolved and concerned with everyday pleasures: "Eating a perfect grapefruit, running through the park, paddling a canoe, listening to loons on a lake... freshly-squeezed orange juice, the freshness of a new morning, the smell of your morning coffee, warm water tingling on your back in the shower, hummingbirds suspended above a bird feeder, a wonderful massage."

Society equates wealth with power, status and success. This may be so, but what is necessary for contentment is judicious balance, Dembe suggests: "Money without love, friendship, learning and satisfaction with what you do, is meaningless. So many people just talk about balance, but they don't go deeply enough and actually modify their lives."

Joy comes from the willingness to try something new, to explore novel avenues of thought and action. After failing to climb a mountain, the author concluded that although she hadn't gone the full distance, she did not feel dejected. After all, our physical and emotional pursuits always teach us something about ourselves. "I had definitely stretched my boundaries. Often just showing up for something that you perceive to be scary can be quite an accomplishment."

This helpful book shares with readers the precious truth that every day is a gift to enjoy and cherish.

Israel's Olympic Team

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began to look at some of the Internet sites devoted to the Sydney Olympics and particularly the ones dealing with Israeli athletes and Jewish competitors from around the world. Even if you didn't decide to mortgage your home for tickets to the Games, you can travel to the Olympics via the Internet at a fraction of the cost.

This year's 40-strong delegation from Israel is very different from the one Israel sent when it first competed in Helsinki in 1952. Then, the most notable achievement was by Yoav Ra'anan, who took ninth place in springboard diving. Over the next four decades, participating was Israel's main objective. Now, thanks to superior training, coaching and the expertise of immigrants from the former Soviet Union, Israel hopes to bring home its first gold medal. For more, check out Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affair's Olympic page [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0hq50].

The Olympic Committee of Israel has put together a superb site [http://olympic.achla.co.il/]. Although there are a couple of pages in English giving an overview of the committee's work, the site really excels in Hebrew. There's a summary of how Israel has fared at the Olympics over the years, a list of every athlete who has competed, a timetable of this year's competitions. There's even a page acknowledging this year's official sponsors of the Israeli Olympic team including Speedo, Samsung cellphones and Telma Cornflakes.

For more about this year's athletes in English, check out Israel's Olympic Hopes [http://israeliculture.about.com/culture/israeliculture/library/weekly/aa073100a.htm]. And you'll find a list of Jewish competitors from the rest of the world at Jewishsport.com [http://jewishsport. com/otherathletes.html].

As for the official site for the Sydney 2000 Olympic Games, the information about Israel (and most other countries) is limited to excerpts from the Britannica.com Web site [http://olympics.com/eng/countries/ISR/sport/index.html]. Aside from learning that "Israel is a land of contrasts and splendours," there is an overview of the Olympic movement in the country and a page on the geography of the country. One interesting feature of the site allows you to send e-mail to the athlete, the team or even all competitors in Sydney [http://www.fanmail.olympic.ibm.com/compose/index.html]. For daily progress of Israel's Olympic team in English, check out the Jerusalem Post [http://jpost.com/] and the English language edition of Ha'aretz [http://www.haaretzdaily.com].

Sydney's Jewish community has rolled out the red carpet for spectators fortunate enough to make the trek to the Games [http://www.join.org.au/sojoc/]. Families throughout the Sydney area have volunteered to open their homes to visitors who require Shabbat hospitality. According to the site, special events being held this month include the establishment of a permanent memorial to the Israeli Athletes killed at the Munich Olympics (1972), Jewish walking tours of Sydney and special Olympic celebrations. You can even buy a medallion specially minted by Sydney's Jewish community that shows a stylized menorah on one side and city's famous Opera House on the other.

In the face of this hospitality, earlier this year Australian Jewish sports officials were urged to boycott the Israeli Olympic team when it arrives in Sydney, to protest the 1997 Maccabiah Games bridge collapse in Ramat Gan in which four Australians died [http://www.foxsports.com/olympics/2000/stories/00528israel1.sml]. "No Australian (Jewish) official should meet the Israel Olympic team; otherwise the result could be the painful spectre of Jews in Australia demonstrating against the Israeli team," said Colin Rubenstein, executive director of the Australia Israel and Jewish Affairs Council.

Rubenstein's sister was one of 60 Australian Jewish athletes injured in Israel.

After the Games end, Sydney will have a couple of weeks to catch its breath before it welcomes its next set of visitors. On Oct. 18, Australia hosts the Paralympics, the elite competition for the world's top athletes with a disability [http://olympics.com/eng/paralympics/index.html]. Israel is a veteran participant of these Games. In fact, Tel Aviv hosted the third Paralympic Games back in 1968 [http://paralympic.org/sports/results/paralympics/index.htm].

Could Israel ever find itself hosting the full-blown Summer Olympics? Earlier this year, three architectural students from Tel Aviv University proposed that their city consider hosting the 2012 Olympics games. Their idea was championed by Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai and ridiculed by practically everyone else. But an article in Ha'aretz says there are many good reasons to write off Israel's chances – and even better ones to give it a second look [http://www.gsnonweb.com/gsnlib_a/gsn2000/2000_04/20000407/65393.html].

"It is easy to respond with cynicism or derision to this ambitious proposal… In the 50 years of its existence, Israel has proved that it is capable of grappling with huge and complex projects in a short time. So it would be advisable to seriously examine the feasibility of holding an Olympiad in Israel."

Camp Ramah director moves on

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Mitch Cohen doesn't feel that his recent professional move from Camp Ramah in Canada, where he served as director for 11 years, to the Solomon Schechter Middle School of Westchester, NY, is a departure from the field of informal Jewish education to its formal counterpart.

"I think there were formal aspects at Ramah, and I'm trying to add some informal techniques to the school environment," he said from his office, where he is school principal. He is also the founding principal of the affiliated high school, which is scheduled to open next September.

Rabbi Cohen, 41, was honoured last week at a dinner in Toronto for his years at Ramah.

His affiliation with the Ramah system, which comes under the umbrella of the Conservative movement, dates back to his university days, when he was on staff at a Ramah camp in California. Even then, he felt it was where he belonged, he said.

A native of Long Island, Rabbi Cohen practised as a lawyer before entering the Jewish Theological Seminary, where he was ordained as a rabbi in 1990.

Although he moved to Toronto with his wife Cari and the oldest of their three children following his ordination, the family moved back to New York in 1992. Rabbi Cohen remained full-time director of Canada's only Ramah camp, located in Utterson, Ontario, commuting here on a monthly basis and relying on technology such as e-mail to work from New York.

Rabbi Mitch Cohen

In an interview in the camp newspaper, Kol Ramah, Rabbi Cohen said he wasn't really looking for something new, but the opportunity sounded very exciting. "Although I still love my work at Ramah, and derive a lot of satisfaction from it, I've known all along that I couldn't do it forever," he said at the time.

What he enjoyed most at Ramah was inspiring kids Jewishly, he told The CJN. In recent years, the camp has been turning away more than 100 applications a year, he said, and funds are being raised so they can accommodate more children.

Among his challenges was "creating a new community from scratch" every year, Rabbi Cohen said. The tone he tried to set was one of high morale, friendliness and good feelings.

He has received some flack – from both left and right – over what he calls a "compromise policy" regarding the ritual participation of females in religious services. Some campers come from communities where women do not participate ritually; others are from completely egalitarian backgrounds, he explained.

Most of the American Ramah camps, in contrast, are completely egalitarian, or they offer a choice of services.

"I'd rather all our kids daven together, even if it means compromising," he said, referring to the way the majority of services have been run. "That is the best thing for our camp community."

Rabbi Cohen already misses Camp Ramah "tremendously," but for the foreseeable future, he will only return as a parent on visitors' day.

It wouldn't be too healthy for the new director, he quipped, referring to Rabbi Matthew Kaufman, if his predecessor were to hang around.

Baycrest Foundation appointments

TORONTO — Two well-known Torontonians have taken senior positions at The Baycrest Foundation, the fundraising arm of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Fran Sonshine has been elected chairperson of the board of directors, while Mark Gryfe was appointed president.

Sonshine has volunteered in the Toronto Jewish community for many years. From 1993 to 1995, she was president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, and has been active since in the organization's national activities.

One of her first volunteer experiences was as a "volunteen" candy-striper at Baycrest at the tender age of 13. For the past 10 years she has worked for Baycrest, and last year chaired the Brazilian Ball, which raised more than $1.5 million for the Sandra A. Rotman Chair in Neuropsychiatry at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute.

Gryfe has worked in Jewish communal organizations since 1978, including UJA and Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, most recently as national executive vice-president. In Toronto in 1986, at the age of 30, he became the youngest UJA campaign director of a major North American city.

He has also volunteered with such organizations and institutions as the ALS Society of Metropolitan Toronto, Beth David Synagogue and Jewish Family & Child Service.

Beth Tzedec's Judaica collection catalogued

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Beth Tzedec's spiritual leader, put it, Art And Tradition: Treasures Of Jewish Life is the fulfillment of a dream.

Art and Tradition, a 122-page coffee-table volume printed on glossy stock and filled with 120 coloured photographs, celebrates Beth Tzedec Congregation's Cecil Roth Collection of Judaica, one of the finest in North America.

The cover of Art and Tradition. The object is a 19th-century North African amulet.

With the publication of the book, Beth Tzedec can now share the Cecil Roth Collection with the world, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl in a ceremony last week.

The collection, which includes more than 1,000 ceremonial objects, is housed in the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum.

It was established in 1965 with the acquisition of Roth's renowned Judaica collection.

Bob Cohen, Beth Tzedec's president, described the museum as one of the five best synagogue museums in North America.

Dr. Fred Weinberg, a Judaica collector in his own right, said that the collection was purchased for "a sum that would be considered modest today."

In a chapter in Art And Tradition, Dr. Weinberg disclosed that it was bought through "a combination of good fortune and decisive action."

In 1962, Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg of Beth Tzedec learned that Roth, a distinguished professor of Jewish history at Oxford University, was retiring and planning to sell his collection of Judaica.

Roth, the author of such works as The History of the Jews and The Jewish Contribution To Civilization, gathered his artifacts over a period of 40 years in countries ranging from Italy to Egypt.

The collection consists, of among other items, illuminated marriage contracts dating from the 17th to the 20th centuries, several Esther scrolls, and Chanukah lamps.

Rabbi Rosenberg, having discovered that Roth did not want the collection auctioned off or broken up, advised Beth Tzecdec's board of governors to buy it.

With the help of congregants Samuel and Israel Shopsowitz, Beth Tzedec acquired Roth's collection and built a museum for it.

The collection arrived in Toronto in 1965, was previewed at Beth Tzedec's annual dinner, and then officially dedicated. The guests of honour were Roth and his wife, Irene.

Since then, the museum has added a number of important acquisitions to the Roth collection. Currently, it consists of 1,600 artifacts representing Jewish art and history from ancient times to the present.

Art And Tradition, whose publication was funded by Howard and Carole Tanenbaum, showcases many of the most outstanding objects in the collection.

The pieces include an 18th-century circumcision chair from Prussia, marriage contracts from Gibraltar, Italy, Afghanistan and Palestine, and a 19th-century silver kiddush cup from the Habsburg Empire.

Among the other striking artifacts are a World War II Chanukah lamp made from copper bullet casings, a 17th- century Italian Esther scroll, a 19th-century Polish matzah cover, a 20th-century Torah crown from Toronto, and a late 19th-century Persian silk carpet presented to a Jewish doctor by the Shah of Iran.

Realtors' conference set for Rosh Hashanah

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Real Estate Association (CREA), a parent body to which real estate professionals belong, says it is sorry that it scheduled its annual conference on Rosh Hashanah, but the conference is going ahead anyway.

"I'm really upset at this," an angry Barry Lebow, a Toronto land appraiser, told The CJN.

In a recent letter to Lebow, CREA said the association tries to avoid major religious holidays, including Rosh Hashanah, when booking its conference. It said the date for its meeting originally had been set for late October, but the Metro Convention Centre in Toronto bumped it for another meeting of "a large, international city-wide" convention.

"While I regret and do not like the centre's decision in this regard, it was impossible to obtain space elsewhere in the time frame that we were originally looking for," CREA's letter stated.

"Please be assured that it is our practice not to schedule the conference on such holidays. Unfortunately in this case, due to circumstances beyond our control, we had no alternative. We do regret and apologize for the timing of the conference."

Lebow calls the explanation "lame. People have calendars. This is a total affront."

The exchange began last month, when an irate Lebow fired off a letter to CREA.

"There are approximately 200,000 Jews in Toronto. A good percentage of TREB (Toronto Real Estate Board) members are Jewish, including past presidents. How dare you come into this city and schedule a major event on Rosh Hashanah? It's an affront to every Jewish member of CREA, and as a Jew and a member of CREA, I am not pleased," Lebow wrote.

He told The CJN last week that "at least" 2,000 real estate brokers, agents and others in the business in and around Toronto are Jewish, and many are upset. Members of the Toronto Real Estate Board are automatically due-paying members of CREA.

"The issue will not be left quietly to pass," Lebow told CREA. "I intend to push the envelope on this one. Someone totally screwed up and should be fired or resign and take the [executive] committee with them."

Lebow writes a column for Real Estate Magazine, "and this will be at the top of my agenda."

He said the annual meeting of CREA offers realtors a chance to network, hear seminars and attend a large trade show.

But Paul Slavens, proprietor of Paul Slavens Real Estate Inc., one of the larger firms in Toronto, told The CJN the CREA conference is no big deal.

"They bring out recommendations. No one really cares. We care about our local areas," he said.

"I'd be more upset if you told me I had to sell real estate on Rosh Hashanah."

Police ready for Jewish holidays, says Fantino

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the High Holy Days approaching, police have been told to pay special attention to synagogues, Metro police Chief Julian Fantino told the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region executive.

"It is done automatically now," Fantino said. "I give you my absolute commitment; we are sensitive to your community."

At the same time, Fantino praised the Jewish community as dignified and law-abiding, and paid special tribute to Holocaust survivors and other victims of anti-Semitism.

Though only 11 incidents have occurred to date this year compared to 35 in 1999, "we do not believe this represents the prevalence of hate crime; traditionally there is a reluctance of victims to come forward," Fantino said.

"I know the vulnerability of your community. I know of your history. You are an excellent community and I want to pay due respect to the people here who have already suffered."

He was introduced by Ontario region chair Keith Landy as "a friend of the Jewish community."

Most hate crimes are committed by men age 26 to 40, and by individuals rather than groups, Fantino said. Race is the foremost reason for this kind of crime, with religion running second.

Organized hate groups are using the Internet "as a tool for so much of the nonsense we have to put up with." Members of the Toronto hate crimes unit are receiving training in how to deal with it, "and we are moving forward in fighting computer crime," he said.

In answer to a query on terrorism, Fantino said: "We don't appear to be impacted by terrorism here as elsewhere. But we can't be complacent. None of us can discount the danger."

Police must monitor international events in order to keep up with problems that might be faced here.

With its record of safety, Toronto is the envy of other cities, he said, pledging to keep this record.

The greater Toronto community of 165,000 Jews raises $41 million to help Jews, while the United Way, on behalf of everyone living here, raises $60 million, federation officer Dov Altman said. "We are the envy of other Jewish communities."

Executive member Naim Dallal asked that special prayers be said in synagogues during High Holy Days for the Iranian Jews who are still prisoners.

THE UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN FOR OUR CHILDREN

UJA FEDERATION

No one gift changes more lives.

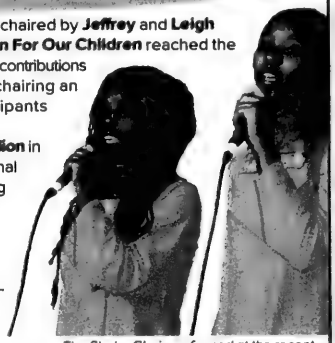
the Campaigner

Campaign Vision is 20-20

Just twenty days after the Community Launch, chaired by Jeffrey and Leigh Wortsman, the UJA FEDERATION Campaign For Our Children reached the $20 million mark, with nearly $2 million in increased contributions so far. A special thank you to Gerry Sheff for chairing an outstanding Top Gifts Dinner with 300 participants preceding the Launch.

The Campaign For Our Children has $45 million in sight - $4 million more than last year, with additional donations designated to help children at risk; bring our kids closer to Jewish life; and rescue Jewish youth from hopelessness and anti-Semitism in the former Soviet Union.

Momentum building... Last month's Community Campaign Launch, with 1300 participants, is generating endless energy. To date, more than 500 dedicated canvassers are meeting tremendous enthusiasm from donors.



The Sheba Choir performed at the recent Community Launch of UJA FEDERATION's Campaign For Our Children.

Calling for Kids

This week's Super Sunday/Super Week Calling For Kids Telethons - which are underway until September 21 -- raised over $2 million for Campaign 2001 - The Campaign For Our Children.

Super Sunday Chairs Peter Ekstein, Debbie Kimel and Carole Sterling report eager participation from our community's dedicated volunteers.

If you can't make it to Calling for Kids Telethons this time, there are still lots of ways to donate your time and talent. Just phone The Campaign For Our Children HOTLINE at (416) 631-5705 for more information.

You can also donate on-line securely and conveniently at www.jewishtoronto.net

Campaign Close-Up

Susan Gudofsky

When the children are small, demands are great and it's not always the ideal time to take on added responsibilities. But that's exactly when Susan Gudofsky plunged into the pool of UJA FEDERATION volunteers. And she's been making waves in wonderful ways ever since.

"When my children started day school, I started donating my services to UJA FEDERATION, not only as a means of giving back to our community, but also of teaching my children the value of volunteering by example," Susan says.

For the past two years, Susan has devoted her considerable energy and talents to co-chairing the Telethon Committee of Women's Campaign and Advocacy. Of all her community work, telethons have been the most rewarding.

"While our community is blessed with many women who are in a position to make extremely large individual donations, most of the women we call at telethons contribute on a much smaller scale." And yet, Susan notes, "their annual donation often carries with it great personal commitment. I'm speaking of women who have donated faithfully through the years and now are widowed or on fixed incomes, and yet they would no sooner cancel their support than not buy groceries."

This year, with The Campaign For Our Children focusing on special initiatives for our youth, Susan feels that tie will be even stronger. "Any increase this year, $5 or $500, will go to help our kids, thus enriching their lives on a scale surpassing anything the campaign has done before."

Campaign Connections

A Bar Mitzvah during the summer Family Mission.

Family Ties... Imagine the wonder of seeing Israel through the eyes of a child. That's exactly the experience of a lifetime recently shared by two UJA FEDERATION Family Missions to Israel. The missions enabled 14 young people marking their B'nai and B'not Mitzvah to share their simchas as a family, as a community, and as witnesses to the human face of tzedakah.

Mission Chairs Jeff and Laurie Cohen and Helen and Steven Silverstein were unanimous in their enthusiastic reaction to the trip. "UJA FEDERATION constructed an amazing itinerary that equally appealed to kids from 5-17 and their grandparents alike," Laurie said. "Because it was a UJA FEDERATION mission," Helen continued, "we were able to see and do things not routinely available to other tourists."

Making Campaign Headlines... As part of the Campaign's ongoing commitment to provide thought-provoking speakers, Jerusalem Report Editor, David Horovitz, recently offered his observations about the Mid-East peace process to 200 people at Adath Israel Synagogue.

David Horovitz

In cooperation with York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, UJA FEDERATION's Young Lawyers Campaign hosted a luncheon symposium on Money, Morality and the Marketplace in mid-September. Guest speakers Aaron Feuerstein and Dr. Meir Tamari addressed a full house at the offices of PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP.

The Young Leadership Cabinet (YLC - ages 25 - 40) organized a 100-member Super Sunday shift, greatly contributing to the overall success of the day. Thanks to YLC Fundraising Chairs Lesley Arbus and Leslie Erlich.

Also planned is a YLC business workshop for October 24, co-chaired by Leanne Spier and Mitch Kramer.

The next YLC Shabbat Amongst Friends Dinner is scheduled for October 20, at Beth Emeth with Rabbi Howard Morrison. To learn more about YLC events, please call Jared Isaacson at 416-631-5732.

Women on the Move... Last week, Women's Campaign and Advocacy conducted a Bus Mission to She'arim Hebrew Day School, the Bernard Betel Centre and Jewish Family and Child Service. The day trip gave women in our community a first-hand look at the work done by UJA FEDERATION member agencies. Upcoming Bus Missions are set for October 30 and November 15. For more information, please call Elana Paice at 416-631-5692.

Bus Mission participants visit various beneficiary agencies.

Dr. Charles Hollenberg doesn't rest on his laurels

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Charles Hollenberg, one of Canada's most respected doctors and health administrators, is five years past the official retirement age, but you wouldn't know it.

Hollenberg, who turned 70 last week, still maintains a busy schedule. He is a senior consultant of Cancer Care Ontario, a government-funded organization, as well as a practising physician at the Toronto General Hospital.

"I am, however, retired from the University of Toronto," said Hollenberg, a professor emeritus who broke a hoary barrier in 1970 when he became the first Jewish dean of the U of T's department of medicine.

Hollenberg, who was physician-in-chief of the Toronto General Hospital when that historic appointment was announced, recalled that "a small reactionary group of older doctors" opposed it.

"But this opposition had no support within the senior university administration," he said, adding that he was warmly greeted upon taking up his job.

Since then, he pointed out in a wide-ranging interview, Canadian medicine has largely ridded itself of anti-Semitic elements. "Today, a physician of Jewish origin can achieve any position in Canadian medicine."

Well into the 1950s, he noted, there was "a very strong anti-Semitic tradition" in the clinical departments of the U of T's faculty of medicine. "Enlightened leadership in the 1950s and 1960s largely eliminated this prejudice from these departments."

To the best of his knowledge, anti-Semitism never significantly affected his career.

After studying at the University of Manitoba and completing an internship and residency at the Winnipeg General Hospital, Montreal General Hospital and New England Center Hospital in Boston, Hollenberg was ready to make a mark.

In 1960, he joined McGill University as a lecturer in medicine. Within nine years, he was a full professor.

Toronto beckoned, and after accepting a full professorship at the U of T, he was asked to be director of its Banting & Best Diabetes Centre, one of the finest of its kind in North America. Concurrently, he was vice-provost of the U of T's Health Sciences.

In 1991, Hollenberg, whose broad clinical specialties are endocrinology and internal medicine, was installed as president and chief executive officer of the Ontario Cancer Treatment and Research Foundation, the forerunner of Cancer Care Ontario. As founding president, he ran the CCO until last year and was then appointed senior consultant.

CCO is responsible for planning the delivery of cancer services – radiation treatment, chemotherapy, supportive care, prevention and research – throughout the province.

As senior consultant, Hollenberg advises CCO's management on a wide variety of issues and also reviews its performance.

"Cancer treatment programs have improved markedly over the past 25 years," he explained. "But as the song goes, the best is yet to come. Due to the revolution in molecular genetics, we will soon see the advent of cancer treatment regimes that are far more specific and effective than any presently in use. The new approaches will be tailored to an individual's disease and will be much less toxic."

In his view, the new therapies will have a dramatic effect on the treatment of cancer within five to 10 years. "We will be able to treat successfully certain cancers that are now unapproachable."

Although cancer research in Canada is considerably advanced, "the number of programs here are relatively few compared to our population and wealth. Nonetheless, Canadian scientists have made very major contributions to our knowledge of the cause and treatment of cancer and will continue to do so as new funds become available."

Charles Hollenberg

Hollenberg, the 1999 recipient of the Wightman Award in recognition of his contributions to Canadian medicine, believes that new approaches to treating diabetes are developing rapidly.

"Transplantation of pancreatic islet tissues offers real promise to those with insulin dependent diabetes. New drugs to improve the efficiency of insulin will also assist in the management of this disease."

As director of the Banting & Best Diabetes Center, Hollenberg assisted in the development of a multi-million dollar endowment fund to support diabetes research at the U of T.

As chair of the U of T's department of medicine until 1981, Hollenberg recruited first-rate personnel who, he said, gave the university an international reputation.

And to the benefit of patients, he created interdisciplinary specialty groups at the Toronto General Hospital.

Earlier, at McGill, Hollenberg was mainly involved in medical research turning on the growth and metabolism of fat tissue. "This was a particularly productive phase of my career and one that I enjoyed thoroughly."

In retrospect, he said, his positions as chair of the U of T's medical faculty and as physician-in-chief at the Toronto General Hospital gave him the greatest professional satisfaction.

An Officer of the Order of Canada since 1991, he was born and raised in Winnipeg,

'Best is yet to come,' says still active medical pioneer

the son of Abe and Mina Hollenberg.

"My father's family immigrated to Canada from Austria in the first few years of the 20th century. My paternal grandfather was a merchant who lived and worked at various times in rural Saskatchewan and Winnipeg.

"My mother was born in Jerusalem. She was from a Lithuanian family who settled in Palestine in the 1880s and moved to New Zealand very early in the 1900s. Her father was a rabbi. She came to Canada as an exchange student in the mid-1920s and met my father. My father was a physician with a very large and successful practice in Winnipeg, and was a popular lecturer at the University of Manitoba's faculty of medicine."

'A place in medicine for every talent'

Hollenberg's wife of 44 years, Mimi Gelfand, is a librarian with a McGill degree. Since the mid-1970s, she has been head librarian at Branksome Hall, a private Toronto girl's school.

A member of Holy Blossom Temple, he has close ties with Israel's medical community. He was a visiting professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, and in 1983, the Weizmann Institute established a chair in his name in metabolic disease.

To this day, medicine inspires him.

"I believe that a career in medicine is among the most satisfying opportunities for people with energy, intelligence and a true commitment to community service," he said. "There is a place in medicine for every talent and every interest, provided one has the commitment to serve, the intelligence to handle a ceaseless volume of new information, and the energy to live through very long and trying days.

"Medicine has changed greatly since I graduated in 1955, technically for the better. But a depersonalization has crept into the practice of medicine which, despite many attempts on the part of medical educators to combat, continues to advance."

Awed by medicine's extraordinary technical advances since his days as a young and upcoming doctor, Hollenberg is confident that the future will be even better.

"Over the next quarter of a century, we will see a revolution in medical diagnosis and treatment based on the genetic revolution which has occurred in basic laboratories since the 1970s. It will be a formidable challenge for the medical profession to introduce these new therapies wisely and ethically.

"But if we can maintain an approach to the delivery of health care which respects the rights, privileges and needs of the individual, we should see a flowering of health care in terms of quality and effectiveness."

Cutbacks by Ontario governments in health care in recent years have had a profoundly deleterious impact, he said.

"Expenditure reductions were undoubtedly necessary in order to control overall government spending. Yet the blunt way in which they were introduced, particularly in hospitals, has produced a very long waiting list for essential services."

Hollenberg is heartened by the news that the federal government will increase spending on health care and by the fact that significant sums of money are being poured into medical research.

"Obviously, the future looks brighter than the recent past."

Worldwide Get Day set

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a worldwide effort to help agunot, L'maan B'not Yisrael International has announced that Oct. 3 is Agunah Get Day.

Mattie Klein, founder and director of the New-York based organization which is dedicated to helping the plight of the agunah, says that on this day, "Jews are challenged to encourage recalcitrant husbands to do tshuvah and give their agunah wives a get before Yom Kippur."

Batei din will be ready and prepared in various locations across North America and in Israel to facilitate the get process, and L'maan B'nos Yisrael will cover the cost of the sofer, "in an attempt to participate in this great mitzvah," said Klein from her New York office.

Prior to the get day, a Tfillah and Tehilim day for agunot will be held on erev Rosh Hashanah – the first was held erev Rosh Hashanah last year – in which participants are encouraged to recite the prayer written by Rabbi Mordechai Tendler. A copy of the prayer can be obtained by calling the organization's office at 718-338-0833.

The agunah crisis is growing daily, said Klein, "as a result of the cruelty of those who refuse to gives their wives a get, and the indifference and silence of others who stand by and do nothing to stop this terrible injustice."

Klein said synagogues can help the organization by distributing Rabbi Tendler's prayer, encouraging synagogue members to participate in Agunah Get Day, and having the synagogue become an agunah help centre, a "safe haven for agunot in your community."

Torah dedicated for new Chabad congregation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Passersby probably thought the Sunday morning procession along Bloor street was connected with the hoopla surrounding the Toronto Film Festival.

But what they were seeing was part of the dedication of a Torah scroll to the fledgling Chabad downtown congregation.

Nearly 50 people from the congregation, as well as visitors from other parts of Toronto, accompanied the Torah, which was carried under a chupah in accordance with Jewish tradition, as it was brought from the Quality Inn hotel room where the congregation holds Shabbat services, along Bloor to the Jewish Community Centre at Spadina Avenue.

Yitzchak Slavin, in black suit and hat, leads young boys in dancing during the Torah procession along Bloor Street.

Participants sang and danced to music provided by a clarinetist from the Zemer Orchestra. At the JCC, a breakfast was served, and everyone took home a piece of parchment and a fine quill pen as momentos.

Rabbi Nechemia Deitsch, who began the Chabad downtown presence last winter, told The CJN how it all came about.

Rabbi Nechemia Deitsch carries Torah donor Dr. Yigal Yahev on his shoulders.

It seems that Yigal Yahev, an oral surgeon from Chicago, was attending a conference in Toronto. When he asked where he could daven on Shabbat, he was directed to Rabbi Deitsch, whose minyan holds services every other Saturday.

As is customary, Yahev got an aliyah. To everybody's shock, there was a word missing from his Torah portion, which rendered the entire scroll unfit for use.

Appalled, Yahev promised to donate a Torah scroll. Two months later, he and his daughter accompanied the scroll, complete with mantle, to Toronto.

His only stipulation, Rabbi Deitsch said, was that the congregation hold services every Shabbat. Beginning on Rosh Hashanah, that is what the congregation will do.

After the celebration, the Torah was brought to Rabbi Deitsch's home for safekeeping, until Chabad downtown has a permanent home.

We have just one thing to say to those Jews who attend synagogue only on the High Holidays.

Welcome.

Just what the doctors ordered:

'Break-fast' recipes from Dr. Joyce Brothers and family

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dr. Joyce Brothers and her daughter Dr. Lisa Brothers Arbisser, an Iowa ophthalmologist, have both proven themselves resourceful in the kitchen.

"She's a good cook," says Arbisser of her psychologist mother, who is a household name through her television and radio appearances, advice columns and books.

Arbisser herself wields a mean whisk, as evidenced in the following Custard Cherry Tart recipe she created almost two decades ago to use cherries from the tree in her yard.

She served the rich dessert, along with an array of other delicacies, at a breaking of the Yom Kippur fast in 1983 in Iowa City – and was surprised to hear that I still remember it.

At the time, my husband was completing a one-year fellowship at the University of Iowa Hospitals, where Arbisser was training. She and her husband Amir, also an ophthalmologist, hosted us and dozens of others at their convivial "break-fast."

She resurrected the cherry tart recipe for The CJN, cautioning that it is fat-filled and cholesterol-rich. "We try to eat low-fat [now]," she said.

For balance, Arbisser offered a fat-free, cholesterol-free mock chopped liver recipe that can also be adapted as a mock pâté. Of the modified "word-of-mouth" recipe, she noted, "people just love it."

Now based in Davenport, one of the four "Quad Cities" on the Iowa-Illinois border, the Arbissers still open their home for some holiday meals.

Arbisser's mother sent her own mother's recipe for pea soup. While the soup "doesn't have any special relationship to [Yom Kippur], it doesn't have any meat in it, which makes it very nice," Brothers said.

The psychologist's mother, a lawyer, "only had very few recipes that she made, and she didn't want to share them with her daughters," Brothers recalled over the phone from New York.

She and her sister used to ask their mother for the same recipe, at different times, then compare notes, because their mother would leave out one ingredient for one daughter, another ingredient for the other one, Brothers said, laughing.

"We were very lucky – we had her for a long time," she added.

DR. LISA'S CUSTARD CHERRY TART

Pastry:
12 tbsp. unsalted butter, softened
2½ oz. sliced almonds, skinless
⅛ cup sugar
⅛ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. almond extract
1½ cups flour

Place almonds in bowl of food processor with metal blade, add sugar and salt and process until finely ground but not paste. Add butter, flour and almond extract. Process with quick bursts until just incorporated. Spray tart pan with low-fat oil spray, and press pastry into tart pan. Bake at 350 until slightly brown (about 10 to 15 minutes). Cool completely.

Custard:
6 egg yolks
2 cups milk (whole or 2 percent)
1 cup sugar
4 tbsp. flour
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. vanilla extract
1 tbsp. butter, softened.

Scald milk in microwave or on stovetop, until small bubbles just form. Whisk yolks and sugar together in medium saucepan until light and fluffy. Whisk in flour and salt then slowly pour scalded milk into egg mixture while whisking to avoid lumps. Cook over low flame until thickened (about 10 minutes). Stir in butter and vanilla. Pour into cooled tart crust. Refrigerate until set, several hours or overnight.

Cherry topping:
4 cups fresh tart cherries, pitted (reserve juice)
1 cup sugar, or to taste
4 tbsp. kirsch (cherry brandy) or brandy
⅛ tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
4 tbsp. cornstarch
2 tbsp. lemon juice

Combine cherries, sugar and brandy. Let sit, covered, for about 1 hour. Stir gently now and then until sugar is dissolved. Drain cherries, and reserve.

Remove 2 tbsp. of juice and reserve. Add enough water to remaining juice to make 3 cups. Add nutmeg and simmer over medium heat until reduced to 2 cups (about ½ hour).

Dissolve cornstarch in lemon juice and the reserved 2 tbsp. of cherry juice, and stir into the 2 cups of reduced cherry juice, stirring constantly until thickened (about 3 minutes).

Add juice mixture to reserved cherries, bring to room temperature, then refrigerate covered until chilled.

Arrange cherry topping on top of custard in tart shell. Refrigerate until 1 hour before serving time. Bring to room temperature, then refrigerate covered until chilled.

Arrange cherry topping on top of custard in tart shell. Refrigerate until 1 hour before serving time. Bring to room temperature, and enjoy.

DR. LISA'S "MOCK CHOP" ('LIVER' OR PATE)

6 large red onions, sliced thin
¼ cup dried lentils
2 to 3 cups water or vegetable broth (or salt-free defatted chicken stock)
6 or 7 hard-boiled eggs, whites only, chopped fine
salt & pepper to taste

Optional accompaniment and garnishes

For mock chopped liver:
Rye bread and kosher dill pickles
Sprinkle "liver" with paprika and fresh parsley to garnish

For mock liver pâté:
toast points (firm thin sliced white or wheat bread, toasted and cut into triangles, without crusts) cornichon pickles
sprigs of fresh thyme or other herb to garnish

Spray large non-stick skillet with low-fat oil spray. Cook onions slowly over medium heat, stirring occasionally to prevent burning, until soft and golden brown and caramelized. Add minimal amount of broth or water if needed to prevent sticking (about 1 hour).

(Alternative method: spray baking pan and bake in oven at 325, stirring occasionally. Takes about 1½ hours.)

In medium saucepan simmer lentils with 2½ cups broth until tender and liquid is absorbed. Add more liquid if not tender when dry. Takes about 30 minutes.

Using a food processor or traditional wooden bowl and ½-circle chopper, process onions first, then add lentils and process with quick pulses to consistency of chopped liver (don't overprocess). Fold in chopped egg white. Season to taste with salt and pepper.

For pâté, add chopped egg white and process all three ingredients until smooth. Season and pack into pâté mold, soufflé dish or custard cups until level with edge.

Chill to blend flavours.

Serve with accompaniments and garnish, chilled or at room temperature.

DR. JOYCE'S PEA SOUP

½ bag dried green split peas
1 tsp. salt
1 large onion
2 carrots
1 tbsp. butter
1 tbsp. pasta flakes or pastina

Boil peas and onion in salted water for ½ hour. Skim off scum that appears. Add two carrots, and boil for one hour more. Take out onion and carrots, and mash.

Put carrots back into pot with butter. Stir often. Cook on low flame for 10 minutes after adding 1 tbsp. pasta flakes. (Add water if too thick.) Recipe may be doubled.

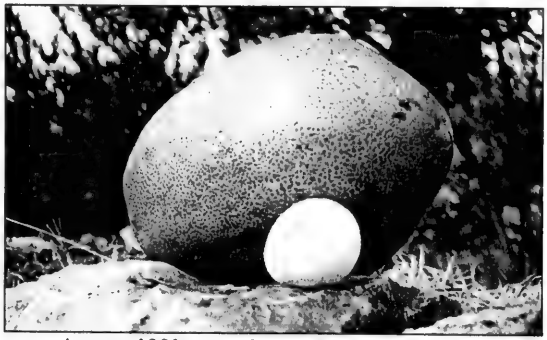
The fruit of the tree of loveliness

By SHARON KANON
WZPS



An unusual 3.9 kg. etrog, shown to scale beside a hen's egg.

Did Adam and Eve take a bite from an etrog? Is there any basis to the claim that the etrog was the Median or Persian apple that grew on the Tree of Knowledge in the Garden of Eden? Was it tasty – the bite of the forbidden fruit that altered the fate of mankind?

The yellow-green fruit – a citron similar in appearance to a lemon – is bitter, and so is its bark. And, yet, for the Sukkot festival it is the uncontestable choice. It is generally agreed that the etrog is the pri etz hadar, the fruit of the tree of loveliness, one of the four species specified for rejoicing during the seven-day autumn harvest festival of Sukkot. In fact, it is said to be the most perfect of the four (palm branch, myrtle and willow) which together symbolizes the unity of different segments of the community.

The etrog scores the highest in aroma and taste according to a midrash. It has both a taste and a pleasant aroma, symbolizing a person who possesses both scholarship and good deeds. (The date palm has a taste, but no aroma; the myrtle, an aroma, but no taste. The willow, neither.)

What are the rules for a kosher etrog? Fruit from a grafted tree is disqualified. An etrog can not be smaller than an egg, dried up, or punctured. If an etrog has a pitum (protuberance) it must be intact and straight. Some people like the etrog without the pitum. People usually select the etrog according to shape, not size, although Rabbi Akiva is known to have hoisted one on to his shoulders. Bumps are good.

What lowers the value of an etrog? A slight tilt at the top, blemishes, spots, marks or injuries of any kind. Grade A etrogim have to pass very stringent tests. In the open markets, some buyers come with a magnifying glass.

Etrogin intended for export have to be put in quarantine for five days to ensure that their state of health is equal to their appearance. Israel exports to the United States, Australia and Europe.

If an etrog seems pricey, remember the effort that goes into growing the fruit for this limited market. Jews since biblical times have been willing to pay well for choice fruit to fulfill the commandment of lehadare (selecting the best). The Code of Jewish Law actually suggests "that one spends one-third more than the minimum price to acquire a beautiful etrog."

"A few months before the harvest," said Assaf Avdani, adviser to etrog growers in Israel, "it looks to be a good year for etrogim. Most are growing pitum and the flowers on the trees are beautiful. Growers expect a harvest of between 150,000 to 200,000 etrogim this year," which will enable Jews the world over to celebrate a fulfilling and kosher Sukkot.

A rabbinical inspector checks etrog in Tel Aviv.

ENJOY YOUR ETROG

This recipe for etrog jam is from The Jewish Theological Seminary. It's great for after Sukkot while the etrog is still fresh.

1 etrog
12+ cups water
¾ cup sugar

Wash etrog, slice and remove all seeds. Using food processor, mince with peel. Place fruit in 6 cups water and soak overnight. Transfer fruit and water to a saucepan. Bring to a boil and simmer uncovered for 20 minutes. Drain fruit. Add remaining 6 cups of water and soak again overnight. Drain water again.

Add sugar and a small quantity of water to fruit – just enough for simmering and cooking. (Less is better. You can always add more later.) Bring to a boil and simmer for 1½ hours, adding water if necessary, until the sugar caramelizes and the mixture begins to jell. Remove from heat.

Holiday Food Ideas

Holiday food on the web

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Are you wondering what in the world to serve your family and guests for the upcoming High Holy Days? Have you searched through your cookbooks looking for a special kugel, a different way to serve carrots, a delicious do-ahead dessert?

Look no further. The answer is right at your fingertips – if you have access to the Internet. Click onto www.jewishfood-list.com, where you'll find the recipe archives of the Jewish Food Mailing List. There are over 800 list members from near and far, including Canada, the United States, Israel, New Zealand, Australia, South Africa, Italy, Belgium and Switzerland.

The list is owned by Brian Mailman of San Francisco. Brian has been in the restaurant business for over 20 years and has been trained in Jewish, Mexican, Italian, German, French and Hungarian cooking. Over 80 percent of the recipes in the archives have been kitchen-tested, which is very helpful to the novice cook. Many recipes are marked D (dairy), M (meat), P (pareve), TNT (tried & true).

This is an excellent culinary resource, particularly at holiday time. Members share rituals and customs, menu suggestions, favourite recipes and time-saving tips. The hot topic right now is what to serve for the upcoming High Holy Days.

Here are some fast and easy recipes that can be incorporated into your menu for breaking of the Yom Kippur fast. And if you need more ideas, the answer is just a click away!

This terrific kugel recipe came from Faygie Leshman, of Boca Raton, Fla., who got it from a girlfriend. "Where she got it, I don't know."

It's very rich, but since you have been fasting, who minds a few extra calories! Another list member wrote: "This is a keeper." She used skim milk, lowfat sour cream, used less margarine and replaced some of the eggs with egg whites, using two egg whites for each egg. Enjoy!

OUTRAGEOUS KUGEL

½ lb. fine noodles
¼ lb. (½ cup) margarine
6 eggs
1 cup sugar
¼ lb. cream cheese
1½ lb. farmer's cheese (dry cottage cheese)
2 cups milk
1 cup sour cream
Pinch of salt
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup white raisins

Topping:
1¼ cups corn flake crumbs
¼ cup margarine, melted
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup sugar

Cook noodles according to package directions; drain with cold water. Melt margarine; pour half of margarine over noodles. Beat eggs with sugar. Crumble cream cheese and farmer's cheese and beat with the milk, sour cream, salt and vanilla. Fold all ingredients together; add raisins.

Blend together all topping ingredients; pour half on the bottom of a well-sprayed 10 in. bundt pan. Add noodle mixture; top with remaining half of topping. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. Let stand a few minutes before you unmold it. Serves 16. Reheats well.

Brenda Shenken, of Auckland, New Zealand, is a frequent contributor to the list. She wrote: "This is a lovely, colourful dish to serve guests for a buffet. The original recipe in the archives is called gefilte fish teraine, but I renamed it."

Since she had difficulty finding frozen gefilte fish loaf in Auckland, Brenda substitutes her regular gefilte fish mixture, using 2 lb. of ground fish.

TRICOLOUR GEFILTE FISH

1 loaf gefilte fish, defrosted
5 carrots, peeled & sliced
1 box (10 oz.) frozen chopped spinach

You need a loaf pan, non-stick vegetable spray and wax paper. Boil carrots until tender. Drain and mash well. Divide fish into three, with one third slightly larger. Place in three separate bowls. Squeeze excess water from spinach and mix thoroughly with one third of fish.

Add mashed carrots to the other bowl and mix well with one third of fish. Spray loaf pan generously with non-stick spray. Line bottom of pan with wax paper and spray paper well.

Place spinach mixture on bottom of pan and spread level. Next spread the larger plain portion of fish over the spinach and spread evenly.

Finally add carrot mixture and spread evenly. Spray with non-stick spray and place wax paper on top and then cover with foil. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. Cool, then place in refrigerator for several hours or overnight.

To serve: Remove foil and layer of wax paper, run knife around edges. Place serving plate over pan, turn over and shake out gently. Peel off wax paper and slice into 1-inch slices.

This recipe was highly recommended by several list members as being a favourite for Rosh Hashanah. It's an easy, cold dish to serve on Shabbat and is ideal for breaking of the fast. The recipe was originally posted by Judith Amrani, of Israel. If you can find orange flower water, it makes it delightfully different and unusual, with a Middle Eastern flavour. Otherwise, substitute freshly squeezed orange juice. The salad gets better the longer it marinates. The recipe can be doubled or tripled easily for a large crowd.

MOROCCAN SWEET CARROT SALAD

⅓ cup honey
¼ cup lemon juice
8-10 carrots, peeled and shredded
Raisins, if desired
1 tbsp. orange flower water (if available)

Dissolve honey in lemon juice, add carrots and raisins, mix well, sprinkle with orange flower water and let sit one hour or longer before serving.

ARUGULA SALAD: A healthy and winning idea.

The dinner before Yom Kippur

By LINDA MOREL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

While preparing for Yom Kippur, many people focus on buying break-the-fast foods, not realizing that partaking in the meal preceding the holiday is a mitzvah. Yet anyone who has hosted this occasion, squeezed between workday and holiday, knows it is fraught with logistical problems.

Known as the seudah mafseket, or closing meal, this dinner by daylight must be concluded in time for people to arrive at their synagogue for the Kol Nidre service, which begins at sundown.

"Because the timing is tricky, eating beforehand is always a quick affair," says a fund-raiser from Manhattan who scrambles to get several courses on the table. A career woman and mother of two children, she can't juggle cooking for a crowd larger than her immediate family.

Selecting appropriate and practical dishes, hosts face menu-planning challenges. Although scheduling tempts us to throw together a meal in haste, Yom Kippur is hardly an occasion for fast food.

The eve prior to the fast should have a festive character, advises rabbi and chef Gil Marks in his cookbook The World of Jewish Entertaining. The table should be set as nicely as it is for the Sabbath. In other words, the evening should have an elegant tone, another issue for busy hosts to consider.

While seeking a menu more exalted than everyday fare, they must steer clear of rich foods, which undermine the solemnity of the holiday and can cause indigestion.

For health reasons, the menu should be plentiful and sustaining. According to the sages, just as Jews must fast on Yom Kippur, they should also eat heartily before sunset in order to participate fully the next day.

Because quenching thirst is forbidden while fasting, bland foods are recommended to prevent undue discomfort during prayers.

Combines holiday traditions with today's food trends

Respecting the holiday's significance and its special needs, the balanced, refined main course below combines holiday traditions with today's food trends. Easily assembled during crunch time, it is as dignified as the occasion.

The menu features a succulent chicken dish that is bursting with mushrooms. The entree of choice on the Sabbath, when families enjoy the best meal of the week, chicken is also a Yom Kippur tradition, dating back to the medieval custom of kaparot. Not often practised today, the ritual entails swinging a fowl over a person's head, transferring his sins to the chicken.

Although chicken is a good choice because it is low in fat and high in protein, many people wonder what to serve with it.

"I'm always in a quandary," says a nurse who works in the World Trade Centre in Manhattan, claiming she usually resorts to buying prepared food, but feels that a home-made meal is more fitting for the holidays.

Although rice is the starch of choice on Yom Kippur eve, couscous, a staple of Moroccan Jews, is a less labour-intensive choice that cooks up in minutes.

The arugula salad below, brimming with apples and tomatoes, can be tossed together quickly. While extravagant desserts are discouraged on Yom Kippur, fruits of all kinds are a pre-fast tradition the world over.

Poached pears and raspberries end the meal on a light note, one that is both nutritious and thirst quenching.

Whether you are serving your immediate family or a larger crowd, it is possible to slow down the pre-fast rush. With some advance planning, you can create a peaceful segue into the year's most important holiday, a blessing to everyone at your table.

The recipes on the following page serve six people.

Vegetarian meal can be a tasty, learning experience

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Entertaining a vegetarian at your holiday meal needn't be a daunting experience, says Francine Teller, a registered nurse who runs a low fat, dairy free vegetarian meal and catering service.

Teller, who offers cooking classes and also speaks to groups about healthy cooking and eating, says it may even encourage people to think about moving towards vegetarianism.

"A vegetarian diets helps reduce heart disease, breast cancer and prostate cancer, and diminishes symptoms of menopause. It may also help you think more clearly and feel calm because your blood sugar is more stabilized," she says.

Becoming vegetarian, however, does not have to be an all or nothing proposition, says Teller. "Do it gradually. Any big changes can be overwhelming.

"You can begin by reducing your intake of red meat, and increasing your intake of calcium-rich vegetables such as broccoli, kale, bok choy or cabbage.You can also replace dairy products with soya milk and cheese, and reduce hydrogenated fat."

When entertaining a vegetarian guest, "don't be shy. Ask them what they eat. If they feel more comfortable eating their own food, suggest they bring an entree, or ask them what you can buy for them."

There are many vegetarian products on the market that can be used to create delicious meals, Teller says. "For example, there is a soya product that resembles ground beef, and a soya roast; both can be turned into creative dishes.

"There is a great public demand for these products, so we're beginning to see more and more out there."

Holiday meals can be totally vegetarian, or hosts can prepare traditional entrees and offer vegetarian side dishes, says Teller. "You can turn your meal into a learning experience. Talk about what you're serving; it may make the vegetarian guest feel more comfortable."

Teller offers these recipes.

Apples and raisins are part of many holiday desserts.

Healthy choices for diabetics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

This is not the time for those with diabetes to abandon their food plan in favour of the high calorie, high fat, high carbohydrate foods traditionally served during the high holy days, asserts dietitian Sharon Gottlieb.

"Stick to a diet rich in whole grains, vegetables and fruits, together with lower fat dairy products, leaner meats or meat alternatives, and use little or no added fats," she advised.

Sharon Gottleib

Gottlieb, director of nutrition for The Fitness Institute, and author of the recently published Seeing the Light: Eat Well, Be Active, Feel Good About Yourself, Once and For All, noted that these are the same healthy guidelines for everyone else as well.

The current approach to diabetic eating includes sugars as part of the carbohydrate portion of the food plan, "so long as it is accounted for, and ideally in the context of a whole meal."

The proteins, vegetables and grains which are part of a regular meal slow down the digestion and absorption of sugar, Gottlieb explained.

Many traditional recipes can be prepared in a lighter way, such as by using fewer eggs, or substituting egg whites, roasting, steaming or broiling rather than frying, and using artificial sweetener instead of sugar.

Use extra vegetables such as cucumber, broccoli, mushrooms, green beans or zucchini, which don't have to be counted in the meal plan if less than ½ cup is consumed, as an alternative to vegetables like squash, carrots, peas, or beets, which are higher in carbohydrates, she suggested.

For dessert, have fruit with a cookie, or plainer sweets, she advised.

Alcohol should be consumed with great care, Gottlieb said. Diabetics should have it only with food, and never on an empty stomach. One-third cup sweet wine counts as 1 sugar choice.

To avoid temptation, "send leftover food home with guests or unmarried children, or store it immediately in the freezer, she said.

"And make notes not to make as much next year!" she added.

It is vital, especially for insulin-dependent diabetics, to stick to their usual schedule of meals and snacks. "Eating less earlier in the day doesn't mean more can be eaten later," she pointed out.

One's personal history and state of health, and instructions by a physician should determine if one should fast, or restrict eating on Yom Kippur. This is especially important for those who are insulin-dependent, she said.

Many traditional recipes have their origin from a time when food was scarce, and opportunities for eating bountifully were few. Now we can eat bountifully any special day.

Our outlook must change, she said. "While food is important, concentrate on visiting with family and friends, and reflecting on life and the good things for which we are grateful."

The following recipes are from Seeing the Light. Nutrition analysis and food choice value follow each recipe.

Joint Beth David, Beth Emeth site in Thornhill cancelled

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It looks like Beth David and Beth Emeth will not be joining forces to establish an additional site in Thornhill.

The two Conservative congregations, located about three kilometres apart in North York, were considering the possibility earlier this year (CJN, March 16).

In a letter to congregants dated Sept. 5, however, Howard Zweig, president of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, wrote that "the Board believes that we do not now require a Thornhill Branch in order to remain a vibrant congregation.... Beth David will still try to identify new ways in which to better serve the Jewish population of Thornhill, but at present this will not include a permanent physical presence in the area."

One possibility that has been raised is an alternate northern location for High Holy Day services in the future, he told The CJN.

For a number of reasons, Beth David's board of directors has "decided to concentrate on our strengths where we are," he said.

"We're disappointed" with Beth David's decision, said Beth Emeth president Sheldon Berg, "[but] I think we're still committed to try and do something in the Thornhill area. We have not come up with any specific plan, but it is our intention to continue to look into this and try and find a way to establish a presence in the Thornhill area."

The two congregations are "still good friends," said Berg, noting an upcoming joint Selichot program and their joint supplementary school.

Toronto artists take top prize in Judaica contest

Gentles and Ross borrowed from various Jewish liturgical and poetic sources the notion of dressing the Torah as a bride, then went looking for fabrics. Initially attracted to a simple and spare Japanese fabric, they eventually opted for a more ornamental European cloth.

"The fabric spoke to us," Gentles said. "It was hard to resist it, once we had touched it. It's really delicious."

Gentles focused on the fabric work, Ross on the beadwork. Their collaboration, Ross says, "has been like a fairy tale.... Each part of it, as it's unfolded, has been like a gift. We've developed a deep friendship. It's been a great pleasure to work together."

Gentles, a teacher at a downtown high school, plans to retire after the current school year to devote herself to her art. Ross, a corporate financial officer, says her craft "is my primary love, but not my primary work."

Both are founding members of the 17-year-old Pomegranate Guild, a collective of Judaic textile artists. Each had independently entered the last Spertus competition, which called for the creation of a spice-box.

Their Torah mantle and numerous runner-up pieces are featured in the exhibition, "Judging the Book by Its Cover: Torah Coverings from the Philip & Sylvia Spertus Judaica Prize Competition," which opens at the museum Sept. 24, 3 p.m. (The opening reception is free and all are welcome.)

The exhibition runs until Feb. 11, 2001. A 56-page colour catalogue of the exhibition is available in paperback for $9.95 (US).

The next Spertus Judaica Competition for 2002 features the mezuzah as the chosen object to be created. For details, contact the Spertus Museum, 618 South Michigan Ave., Chicago 60605. Website, www.spertus.edu.

Bar-Ilan to launch centre to study assimilation

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

RAMAT GAN — Assimilation, the eternal fear of Jewish leaders around the world, tops the agenda of concerns for Jewish communities in the Diaspora.

But for Israelis, who feel mostly immune to the phenomenon and are also experiencing a growing gap with Diaspora Jewry, assimilation is rarely in the public eye.

This week, Bar-Ilan University (BIU) attempted to raise awareness of the issue in Israel with an academic conference on assimilation. BIU is also about to establish the world's first research centre dedicated solely to the study of assimilation, which the university hopes will be a bridge between academic research on its causes and practical solutions.

Yet although trips to Israel and programs such as Birthright Israel – which sends young Jewish adults on free 10-day trips to Israel – are considered by some to be important tools in strengthening Jewish identity and combatting assimilation, the question remains whether Israel and Israelis can play a role in addressing the issue.

Israelis are undergoing an ongoing identity crisis of their own. At the same time, their understanding of Diaspora Jewish life is limited.

"With a correct understanding of what is going on, they can make a contribution," said Lawrence Schiffman, a professor of Hebrew and Judaic studies at New York University, and the only non-Israeli participant in the conference.

However, he added, the conference showed that Israelis are "just learning" what their counterparts in the U.S. Jewish community discovered long ago: the need to address assimilation. It also appeared, he said, that participants were not fully in touch with "the specifics" of American Jewry.

Schiffman rejected the concept of fighting assimilation by trying to stop intermarriage.

"Intermarriage is a symptom of no Jewish education or commitment," he said. "You cannot prevent intermarriage; you have got to teach Judaism, because if intermarriage is meaningless to you, then preventing it just becomes racism."

Ya'acov Eliav, director of BIU's International Centre for Jewish Identity, said Israel can play a role in strengthening Jewish identity in the Diaspora.

He points out a Jewish identity competition run by BIU's Jewish identity center in recent years that attracts 100,000 mostly non-religious youth throughout the Diaspora.

At the same time, Eliav concedes that Israelis are also contributing to the worldwide Jewish population decline – in contrast to conventional wisdom.

"At least 500,000 Israelis live all over the world," he said. "The great majority of them are not connected to any Jewish community whatsoever. They send their kids to public schools and they try to assimilate into society immediately."

According to David Clayman, director of the Israel office of the American Jewish Congress, Israelis can contribute to the issue – although they still have some things to learn about the Diaspora experience. Assimilation, he says, is not as far from the Israeli experience as one might think.

In addition, he added, Israel is home to some of the world's leading academic authorities on Diaspora Jewry. "Israel has the resources," he said.

"If Bar-Ilan really goes ahead and sets something up, I think it could make a very significant contribution."

Kleinberg takes over as JCS director of education

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Darren Kleinberg never wears a watch, but somehow he manages to be punctual. The new director of education at Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) does things his way, and this year he hopes to give Toronto students the opportunity to "have a relationship with Judaism."

A recent arrival from London, England, Kleinberg, 23, wants to take in everything he can, and has already discovered the local jazz and blues scene.

An avid musician, he greeted a visitor at the JCS office recently, guitar in hand, explaining that he woke up with a song in his head and wanted to write it down.

But despite his brown crocheted kippah, the tzitzit hanging over his blue jeans, and the four years he spent at Yeshivat HaMivtar (Brovender's) in Israel, it's not Jewish music he writes and performs, it's indie (independent) rock.

He and a friend form the band "Reach," and have cut a mini disc.

One of Kleinberg's ideas is to schedule a bi-weekly "informal gig" on campus, where students could bring their instruments to play at lunchtime. "I think music has great potential for drawing people in, getting them excited," he said.

His duties in Toronto are threefold, he said. "The priority for me is developing educational experiences on campus for the students." He also provides Jewish education to JCS staff, and is creating partnerships with other organizations and faculty.

Prior to moving here, Kleinberg worked as education director for the London-based Union of Jewish Students (UJS), with responsibility for over 120 campuses in Great Britain and Ireland. He also served as director of Birthright Israel in England. "I was a roaming educator," he said.

He finds university students "a most exciting age group," because they're more liberal and open to learning new things, he said.

His own story is a case in point. Although he attended a Jewish high school, he came from a "totally non-observant" home, but grew up with a sense of pride in being Jewish.

Following high school, Kleinberg embarked on a one-year program in Israel, leaving it after a month to attend yeshiva. He described his experience there as "very academic," and noted that the rabbis had "a very open-minded background. It was great because it took whatever good things I had and just enhanced them in a Jewish context, instead of replacing them."

Canada had never occurred to him as a place to work, but he attended a Hillel conference in Toronto earlier this year at the suggestion of Richard Joel, Washington, D.C.-based director of Hillel International, whom he interviewed for the UJS magazine, The Jewish Student.

Darren Kleinberg

A day spent on campus here, and the opportunity to work with Zac Kaye, JCS executive director, enticed Kleinberg to leave his job in London. "Zac's up there," he said. "He's very well respected."

The biggest difference between campus work here and in Great Britain (London excepted) is that most students in Toronto commute to school.

"It's a killer," Kleinberg said. "In Great Britain, you just go in [to campus] and they're there waiting. Here, the challenge you have is to create a reason for them to come to you. It commits us to creating programs that are so inviting that students will want to make the journey to come on campus."

But he also wants to meet students where they are. That's why he's keeping in mind a program he has used overseas, Booze and Shmooze, where he would sit in a bar with students and discuss issues.

"Alcohol is not the focus," he clarified. "It's the environment. It's much more casual, less intimidating. I think the truth is that 'Jewish space' is very intimidating to a large number of people."

He believes the learning process is a two-way street. "I'm not teaching them," he said. "We are learning together."

Kleinberg considers himself lucky to have a strong yeshiva background and a "laid-back personal attitude and lifestyle." He hopes the combination will help him reach both observant and non-observant students.

And he walks the walk – literally, in at least one case. On a recent Friday night, he attended services at both The Village Shul, which is Orthodox, and Holy Blossom Temple.

"You can't ignore the reality of Jewish existence," he explained. "It's not just Orthodoxy and it's not just Conservative and it's not just Reform."

Hadassah-WIZO month launched

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Hadassah-WIZO month was recently launched at the Senate with a gala evening honouring CBC chief political correspondent Jason Moscovitz.

A scholarship in Moscovitz's name has been established at the Carleton University School of Journalism, his alma mater, in recognition of his in-depth reporting and analysis of Canadian political issues.

During his 25 years with the CBC, Moscovitz has worked in both radio and television, first in Quebec and later in Ottawa.

Since joining the parliamentary bureau in 1980, he has covered every major political event. For the past six years he has been national political correspondent for CBC television's The National and is the host of CBC Radio's weekly political program, The House.

Guest speaker at the award ceremony was Amir Maimon, Counselor and Charge d'Affaires at the Embassy of Israel.

"Jason was one of the first people I met following my arrival in Ottawa," said Maimon. "I wish to thank him for his friendship, and I think it is most befitting that a scholarship is being established in his name."

In accepting his award from Marion Mayman, national president of Hadassah-WIZO, Moscovitz said, "I remember when I wanted to be a journalist, and my father would say, 'Jewish people aren't journalists; you will never get a job.' To my amazement, I got a job.

"I have met some incredible people, seen some incredible things, and travelled all over the world. The political stories that I gathered over the years, I couldn't count them," he said.

"When you are in journalism, in broadcasting, it is not just you – it is other people, the people you reach, people such as yourselves. Journalists have a reputation for being cynical... For all the cynicism that is attached to us, we have a respect for what we do and a respect for our audience."

The evening was hosted by Senator Sheila Finestone, an honorary member of the organization.

Hadassah-WIZO month is being proclaimed in 15 cities across Canada. Ruth Freeman, national vice-president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO and national chair of Hadassah-WIZO month, said that it was fitting that it be proclaimed first in Ottawa, home of Lillian Freiman, the organization's founding president, and the current president.

Our parliamentary Olympiad

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

With a nod to the Olympic spirit, let's add a creative touch to our traditional predictions for the opening of Parliament this week.

Synchronized swimming gold medals have to go to Diane St. Jacques and David Price who made the decision to join the Liberals on the day of Joe Clark's victory. Unfortunately for them, their sink or swim rationale for betraying their caucus will cost them re-election in their ridings under any banner.

Stockwell Day is a shoo-in in the fencing competition. His charismatic approach is catching on across the country and as seasoned as the prime minister is, he will prove to be no match for Day's 'thrust and parries'. Day has to be hoping that Canadians' fascination with him is reflected in real political support.

As suggested by a series of revelations over the summer months, no one is in Alphonse Gagliano's weight-lifting league. In the true spirit of the long tradition of Quebec lieutenants, a number of puzzling contracts are covered with his fingerprints. Suprisingly (!?) some of them don't even have anything to do with his areas of responsibility. Expect charges of doping to dominate the opening days of Question Period.

The cycling (as in back-peddling) gold must go to Lucien Bouchard for his volteface on a healthcare deal with the hated "Feds". The agreement has stripped his gears and it will be increasingly difficult for him to promote his separatist agenda as Quebecers witness the benefits of staying in the federation where it counts the most...their health.

Joe Clark is the people's favourite for gold in the gymnastics category (or is it the hurdles). The acrobatic manoeuvres he has had to employ to explain a growing list of defections is exhausting to observe. Expect an early retirement from competition following a dismal performance in the House and a failure to achieve party status following the next election.

Having decided that his prime ministerial ambitions cannot be set aside, Paul Martin is the acclaimed runner to beat in the leadership marathon. He will stand for re-election and is hoping that after having won an historic three consecutive elections, his boss will finally leave the field and allow him to ascend the platform. Finally, the 100-metre dash will go to the millions of Canadians who reach for their TV remote controls to flip to anything but political coverage. No surprise there...we prefer the Winter Games anyway!

Peace will leave Israel undefendable says Netanyahu

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — As long as the Arab world is ruled by dictators, the only peace Israel can make is one that allows it to protect its security, said former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Any peace treaty is worthless unless Israel, the only democracy in a region of "unreformed dictators," can deter aggression against it, and that means keeping land and retaliating when attacked, Netanyahu said at a public lecture that attracted 1,600 to Congregation Beth Israel-Beth Aaron.

"We cannot defend Israel if it sits on the head of pin... It is folly, madness to practise the wrong kind of peace," he told the audience.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko introduced the former Likud leader as Israel's "once and former prime minister" and "the foremost defender of Zionism, Jerusalem,and the State of Israel.

On Jerusalem's future Netanyahu was unequivocal. "If we give up Jerusalem, we will have nothing" and urged all Jews to stay united in their millennia-old sense of identification with the city.

"Extreme concessions will only produce greater demands from the Arabs. They pocket and pocket, then they say 'we want more, more, more,'" he said.

"Instead of expediting peace, it puts Israel at risk, inflates Arab expectations and makes it impossible to defend the peace."

He pointed out that Palestinian school texts still do not put Israel on the map and teach that "the peace process is nothing more than a stage until the recapture of, not just the West Bank, but all of Israel...

"We have to bring Palestinians' expectations down to earth, to a level that we can have a defensible peace and they can have more than they have today."

Prosperity a key to Israel's security

Prosperity is another key to Israel's security, Netanyahu said. He called for greater liberalization of Israel's economy and an end to heavy state intervention and deficit budgeting.

Strength in technology is not sufficient, he said. There must be less government control and taxation, and more privatization and competition, and freer currency – reforms that his administration began after its election in 1996.

"When we were elected, you could only take $2,000 out of the country. It was like a Third World country... The hardest part was convincing government advisers. They said, 'You're right in the long term, but wrong in the short term. Money will flood out, the currency will collapse.'"

Instead, Netanyahu said, money flowed in. "In our last six months, our foreign investment tripled."

Venture capital per capita in Israel now equals that of the State of California, he said. "If we make Israel business-friendly, we will be able to reverse the old joke: How do you make a small fortune in Israel? Start with a big fortune."

Freeing Israel's economy will also greatly increase aliyah, he continued, bringing in, perhaps, another million Jews from the former Soviet Union and several hundred thousand from South America alone because they are attracted to "the good life."

"And Israelis here will come back," he added. He predicted that the majority of the world's Jews will soon be living in Israel.

He reminded Diaspora Jews that they are "in the inexorable process of disappearing" because of assimilation. "Fifty years ago, there were 12 million Jews, now there are still 12 million Jews. There should be 24 million by normal demographic trends."

He urged Jews here to give their children a Jewish education and to send them to Israel to "connect with their roots" and, ideally, make aliyah.

Montreal Holocaust centre gets $500,000 pledge

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The federal government has pledged $500,000 towards the expansion of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC), Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray announced at the recent Plenary 2000 of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q).

The grant, from Ottawa's Millenium Fund – which Gray helped co-ordinate – is a sign of faith in the Quebec Jewish community, Gray told plenary participants.

"There is a link between what the centre stands for and this conference today. It strengthens our will to survive and our commitment to the community," the 38-year veteran parliamentarian said in his opening session keynote remarks, during which he made the announcement.

Gray was joined at the head table by Quebec Liberal party leader Jean Charest, who also spoke.

In a letter he sent to MHMC director Bill Surkis last May, Gray said the centre's expansion is in keeping with the Millennium Fund's theme of "sharing memories and shaping dreams."

Surkis said that although Gray made the first public mention of the funding, community officials were made aware of it shortly after MHMC got the news.

"I think [centre officials] are more than pleased that these funds will contribute to the development of the museum to teach and commemorate for future generations," said Surkis.

Later, Gray toured the centre, whose expansion will cost close to $5 million and is planned for completion in the fall of 2001.

Another $48,000 is due to come from the federal Economic Development Council, and if applications are approved, from the province, too.

Gray's announcement was among the highlights of the plenary's opening session, which drew as many as 200 people. A luncheon featuring former Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and the first Alan Rose Human Rights Awards drew more than 300, including at least 60 journalists and dignitaries.

Winnipeg Jewish school enrolment stabilizes

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After two years of declining enrolment, student numbers at the the Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) Gray Academy here have stabilized.

"A good portion of our kids returned this year," says BJE business manager Jack Cipilinsky. "Our numbers are about the same as last year."

The Gray Academy, located at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, is for students from junior kindergarten to Grade 12. Last year's student population there was about 660, as compared to 850 when the unified school system opened at the new campus in September 1997.

Cipilinsky credits the improved picture, in part, to the popularity of Joseph Wolinsky High School principal Miriam Maltz with the students. Maltz is starting her second year at Wolinsky.

Cipilinsky also credits the board's "obviously successful" efforts to improve the parents' level of confidence in the system. "Our goal now is to recover some of the enrolment we have lost," he says.

At the high school level, he acknowledges that remains a difficult challenge. Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate has been hit hard by the University of Winnipeg's decision three years ago to open a Grade 10 program. Reportedly, about half the students attending that program are Jewish.

On the positive side, more than 50 children are enrolled in Gray Academy's JK program, an increase over last year, and there is a small waiting list for Grade 1.

The kindergarten-to-Grade 6 Hebrew Bilingual program at Margaret Park School in north Winnipeg is also reporting virtually the same enrolment as last year. A 17-student kindergarten has made up for a similar number of students who graduated last year, keeping student numbers at about 100.

Some other north Winnipeg families bus or drive their children to Gray Academy. North Winnipeg has a smaller and older Jewish population than the southern part of the city, where Gray Academy is located.

In south Winnipeg, parents have a choice of two other Jewish elementary school programs, besides Gray Academy's Shore Early Years School. The Hebrew Bilingual program at Brock Corydon Public School continues to thrive, although enrolment is down somewhat to about 170 – from 183 students two years ago and 175 last year.

The Ohr HaTorah Hebrew Day School is still relatively new, having opened its doors two years ago, with a combined nursery/kindergarten class of about 10 students. For September 1999, a Grade 1 class was added and enrolment reached 18. This year, the school has 26 students and a combined Grade 2/3 class.

With classes at the Herzlia Adas Yeshurun Synagogue, Ohr HaTorah was started by a group of parents who were looking for a more traditional Jewish education for their children. The founding parents were able to link up with the Torah Mesorah system, an internationally known network of Jewish day schools headquartered in New York.

Hugo Levendel served Ottawa community

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Obituary

OTTAWA — Hugo Levendel, born almost a century ago in Hungary, died recently in Ottawa, the city he had called home for more than 70 years.

From the time he arrived in Ottawa to join his brother Alex, who had immigrated a few months earlier, Levendel immersed himself in the life of the city's Jewish community. He brought with him the fervent Zionism he had learned in his youth and soon helped to establish the Jewish Young People's Association as well as a branch of the Poale Zion Organization.

He played an active part in the successive Chalutzim Club, Histadrut Campaign and the Histadrut League, and attended numerous Canadian Zionist conventions.

Shirley Berman, a long-time friend, recalls travelling to Israel with Levendel. "It was a most memorable trip," she said. "We travelled together on a trade-union/labour tour and we met Ben-Gurion."

Levendel was also active in the Jewish National Fund. In his address to the JNF Negev Dinner, at which he was an honouree, he declared: "Zionism was the essence of my existence, and working for it brought its own rewards and the greatest satisfaction."

A man of eclectic interests and many talents, Levendel was a professional photographer who worked with Yousuf Karsh, and later had his own studio. His photographic collection of 1930s-era Byward Market, and its many Jewish merchants, is held in the National Archives of Canada and has been exhibited in city galleries over the years.

The second president of the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society, Levendel took a great interest in preserving the city's past for future generations. "He remained interested in documents, books, historical records and other mementos until the end of his life," says Berman.

During World War II, in which his parents and brother perished, Levendel worked as a federal government censor. He was also, at various times, an immigration consultant and translator – primarily Hungarian, Romanian and Yiddish – which he continued doing until the age of 90.

"His career came to a close," said Levendel's son Lewis, a Toronto writer, "when he chose not to become involved with a fax machine."

Levendel had "an insatiable intellectual curiosity and a zest for life, living and his beloved community," said Lewis. "In his early 80s, he was still walking over on a regular basis to Hillel Lodge [then Ottawa's Jewish Home for the Aged] to deliver current events talks to what he termed 'the old folks.'"

Levendel is survived by Lewis and his wife Lily; daughter Margaret Zbar and her husband Morris; and grandchildren David and Ilana Zbar, all of Toronto.

"בנפול אויבך"- אהרון דהרי

"קראתי את דבריו של מר יורם פירוצקי ואני מסכים אתו ומברך על בחירתו של משה קצב לנשיא מדינת ישראל. אבל אין אני מסכים איתו על דברי ההשמצה כלפי שמעון פרס, וביחוד שהוא משתמש וחוזר על דברים שאומרים אחרים כגון התואר 'חתרן בלתי נלאה'. אל נשכח מספר עובדות: 1) כל נבחר וכל מזרה הם פוליטיים ונוצרים בזמן מסוים. 2) ש"ס לא קיבלה את כל מה שהיא דרשה מאהוד ברק ולכן תמכה מבחינה פוליטית ונקמנית במשה קצב. 3) הכנסת בחרה בנשיא על ידי גופים ומפלגות פוליטיים בהתאם לחוק בחירת הנשיא. 4) במקום להשמיץ יש לתת כבוד למפסיד ובעיקר לאדם שתרם תרומה גדולה למדינה מבחינה פוליטית, בטחונית וציבורית. 5) אל נשכח ששמעון פרס מקובל אצל מנהיגי העולם, ואל נשכח את הפתגם 'בנפול אויבך אל תשמח ובכשלו אל יגל לבבך' (משלי כא, יז)."

קשה, קשה לעקוב אחרי מה שקורה בישראל. ראש הממשלה איבד את רוב שותפות ממשלתו, וממשיך להתנהג כי מתנגדיו בכנסת לא הצליחו לגייס עדיין ששים ואחד קולות הדרושים להפלתו. איש אמיץ שהחליט להמר על השלום, אבל הניח לכל העולם שערפאת לא ממש רוצה שלום. ולמרות כל זאת איננו מצליח להחזיק ממשלה. קשה שלא להעריץ אותו על שאיננו מוכן להיכנע בכל מחיר לסחטנות של ש"ס, אך קשה גם שלא לתמוה איך הוא מצליח להעלים אפילו את תומכיו המושבעים, כאילו הוא עדיין גנרל בצבא. אולי הגיע הזמן שראשי ממשלת ישראל ושריה יהיו אזרחים שלא היו גנרלים וחילקו פקודות, אלא דווקא פוליטיקאים שלמדו להקשיב ולהתפשר. לדעתי זה בלתי הגיוני לצפות מאדם שנתן פקודות שלושים וחמש שנה שיהפוך יום אחד לדמוקראט דגול. ברגעים כאלה הנפש מתגעגעת ללוי אשכול ופנחס ספיר.

Long-range ballistic missiles: problematic military revolution

By REUVEN PEDATZUR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Commentary

Far from the public gaze, a revolutionary security process is underway in the Israel Defence Forces concerning the long-range missile threat.

An interesting analysis of the new concept can be found in Aviation Week magazine, which discusses the developing plans of the IDF and the way senior officers are thinking.

The emerging threat most worrying the army is the long-range ballistic missile. These weapons would be launched by peripheral enemy states like Iran and Iraq – missiles with a range of thousands of kilometres, which are in advanced stages of development.

The Iranians are equipping themselves with the Shihab 3, which has a range of about 1,300 kilometres, and it is certain that in coming years they will have missiles with even greater range that can be launched from deep inside Iran.

According to the concept formulated in the years after the Gulf War, the IDF prepared to deal with the ballistic threat mainly on two fronts. These are passive defence – distributing means of protection to the public, and active defence – trying to intercept the missiles before they reach Israeli territory. This latter strategy is based on the Arrow anti-missile system which is designed to intercept incoming missiles during their final airborne stage.

Lately, says the American aviation weekly, the IDF has entered a new area of strategy to provide it with a better capability to confront the ballistic missile threat. The magazine means a capability to strike missile launchers deep inside enemy territory.

The Air Force, in fact, continues training pilots to find and attack launchers at long range, and the need for such missions was one reason for acquiring the F-15s, which have a long operational flight range.

However, the complications and dangers involved in sending manned aircraft such great distances has led to the formulation of the new concept – that of attacking missile launchers with pilotless aircraft. These would fly to areas where the launchers are deployed, locate them, and launch fast missiles to destroy them.

Aviation Week says Israel will develop two types of long-range drones with the ability to stay airbone for about 60 hours. One type will carry sensors to detect launchers, and the other will carry the missiles to destroy them. The information gathering capacity of these planes will be combined with additional information from spy satellites.

The revolutionary aspect of this thinking lies in the assumption that the problem of hunting and finding launchers can be solved effectively. Iran and Iraq use movable launchers. Only a very short time is required to position the launcher after it has been exposed and to launch a missile.

This time will shorten even further when solid-fueled ballistic missiles – they can be fueled before being placed on the launcher – come into operational use. Thus Iranians would be able to move the launcher from hiding, launch a missile in seconds, and immediately hide the launcher again. In addition, hundreds of decoys would be positioned in the launch area, emitting electronic and heat signatures identical to those of real launchers.

The experience of the Gulf War is testimony to the problems involved in locating missile launchers. In spite of very advanced intelligence and absolute air superiority, the coalition forces did not destroy even one launcher. In a number of cases they did attack decoys.

But Moshe Keret, the director-general of Israel Aircraft Industries, is quoted as saying: "In our opinion, today or soon, our concept of destroying launchers will be operational." Aviation Week does not supply details of the revolutionary concept that Keret refers to.

Whether we already are developing new ways to find missile launchers – or whether we are still only thinking about it – it is clear that the "new concept" is highly problematic.

In the case of Iran, we must consider problems of command and control when activating unmanned warplanes that are thousands of kilometres from Israel– not to mention the need to fly a sequence of large numbers of such planes all the time over launch sites.

This is problematic, because when we speak of Iranian missiles with ranges of thousands of kilometres, we know their launchers will be scattered across vast areas of Iran, an area considerably larger than the one Iraq had to launch Scuds during the Gulf War. In addition, as mentioned, there will be the hundreds of decoys.

Such details only highlight how many complicated operational problems the IDF's new concept involves, and that it is doubtful if efficient solutions can be found at reasonable cost. Hence, we need some objective assessment of the chances, the risks, and the costs of such a program before deciding to proceed with it.

There is no escaping the fact that the only way to deal with the threat of non-conventional ballistic missiles is deterrence.

Israelis living abroad may get pensions

By ALISA ODENHEIMER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The minister of labour and social affairs has three months to announce whether to extend the categories of those eligible for a state-funded old-age pension to Israelis who have left the country, the High Court of Justice decided last week.

The minister's decision requires the approval of the Knesset's Labour and Social Affairs Committee.

The court's ruling refers to a petition filed by an Israeli citizen, Michael Halamish, who was born in 1924. He worked in Israel for many years, first as a pilot in the Air Force and then in the civil service and the private sector.

Two of his children moved to the United States followed by his wife. Finally, at the age of 60, Halamish joined them.

When he turned 65, he applied for a state pension from the National Insurance Institute, but was turned down. The NII said an applicant for a pension had to be a resident of Israel at the time of the application.

Halamish asked the District Labour Court to issue a declaration that he was a resident of Israel for the purposes of eligibility for a pension from the NII. He cited the many years he had worked in Israel, always paying his fees to the NII, and said he felt a deep attachment to Israel.

Again his request was rejected, as it was by the National Labour Court, which reiterated the position taken by the NII.

Halamish turned to the High Court of Justice. His lawyer, Yedidya Goren, argued that the interpretation of the law that made eligibility for a pension dependent on residency infringed inordinately on the right to a pension.

The respondents, the NII and the minister of labour, who were represented by attorney Irit Altshuler, maintained that the law does not authorize the minister to promulgate regulations by which Israelis living abroad can receive a state pension. However, they noted that amendments to the law were being considered.

Justices Yitzhak Zamir, Dalia Dorner and Ya'akov Tierkel ruled that no legislation was needed to extend the categories of those eligible for a pension and that the minister could arrange this himself with the approval of the Knesset committee.

Anti-Scud missile test is successful

By AMNON BARZILAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Arrow defence system intercepted and shot down a simulated Scud ballistic missile, in a spectacularly successful test last week.

This was the eighth in a series of Arrow test-firings and defence technology experts described it as an impressive achievement. At a height of 35 kilometres, the missile intercepted a relatively small incoming missile head-on, and developers succeeded in boosting its speed to three kilometres per second.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak and the director general of the defence ministry, Amos Yaron, congratulated the development team at Israel Aircraft Industries for their success and for bolstering the defence capabilities of the country.

American observers were on hand.

The test began when an F-15 fighter took off carrying a dummy Black Sparrow missile. The fighter flew northwest and over the sea fired the missile. The Sparrow accelerated, climbed and headed for the Israeli coast.

At this point, the incoming missile was detected on the command-and-control centre screens at Palmachim test site. The Arrow system immediately began to operate autonomously.

The system's radar locked on to the incoming missile and transferred its data to the command-and-control system. An Arrow missile was fired at the incoming missile within three minutes of the F-15's release of the Black Sparrow.

The Arrow, which has two boost phases, fired its second engine, locked onto the incoming missile's warhead, and met its target head-on, completely destroying it.

'Americans would provide 72 percent of the funding for the project'

The interception came 100 km from the test site, 30 seconds after the Arrow left its launch tube.

"The Arrow was fired and flew toward the target in a stable, precise fashion until it hit and destroyed it," said Daniel Peretz, the head of the program at Israel Aircraft Industries.

The Arrow anti-missile system originally won the support of the late Yitzhak Rabin, when he was defence minister in 1988. The United States agreed to fund 85 percent of the initial phase of the project, which was then estimated at $160 million. The total research and development budget was originally estimated at $1.6 billion.

The plan got a green light from Defence Minister Moshe Arens in 1991, and the project was confirmed as an Israeli R&D weapons system the following year. Israel and the U.S. agreed that the Americans would provide 72 percent of the funding for the project, about $380 million, and a further $300 million grant for the development of the radar and the command and control.

Another $200 million was allocated to the program in 1998. The U.S. agreed to contribute $170 million to build a third battery of experimental missiles.

The first test of the missile took place in the summer of 1995, and the Arrow succeeded in shooting down a surface-to-surface missile the following year. The fifth test of the Arrow failed in 1997 because of a problem in a specific component.

Katsav blames Diaspora Jewry for assimilation

By VIVA PRESS
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — At a conference on assimilation last week, Israeli President Moshe Katsav condemned Israeli politicians for "legitimizing living outside of Israel" in order to exploit Diaspora Jews "for their money and politics."

This validation, he said, is one of the reasons there is a rapid growth in assimilation of world Jewry, despite Israel's growth in population.

"Israeli leaders gave a hechsher [kashrut certification] to living in the Diaspora, because they used Diaspora Jews for their money and politics," Katsav said at a reception inaugurating Bar-Ilan University's conference, From Assimilation to Renaissance.

The conference, held on Sept. 11, covered such topics as Assimilation in Ancient Times, Issues of Jewish Identity and the Jewish Christian Schism, and Holocaust, Assimilation and Renaissance.

Katsav, who made his remarks the day before the conference, said the policy of tolerating Jews living in the Diaspora is no longer necessary, as Diaspora funding is no longer needed to build up the Jewish state. However, he added that Israeli leaders have "legitimized living in the Diaspora and have said it does not bother us."

The president called on world Jewish leaders to put aliyah at the top of their agenda. The number of immigrants to Israel from North America has dropped over the last few years. Last year, fewer than 40 Canadians made aliyah.

If Jews don't immigrate to Israel, said Katsav, assimilation will thrive and endanger Jewish existence. "The only branch that can ensure the continuation of the Jewish nation is the Jewish State," he said.

He also rejected other possible solutions to assimilation, including Jewish education, which he said was a "makeshift action that could, at best, last two or three generations."

Dr. Becky Kook, a professor at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, said she wasn't surprised by Katsav's comments.

"The whole relationship between the Diaspora and Israel Jewry has never been properly addressed by the Israeli side," she told The CJN. "On the one hand, Israel has close connections with the Diaspora, but there are also ambivalent feelings.

"Israel is a Jewish state, not an Israeli state," said Kook, who specializes in issues relating to nationalism, national identity and democratic politics in Israel.

"There is a terrible burden on Diaspora Jews because everyone is a potential citizen of Israel. There are Diaspora communities who may have support for Israel but feel loyal to their own states.

"And because Israel has never thought of establishing a relationship on proper ground, the whole situation is skewed," she said.

"Israel has no right to make comments [like these] on the Diaspora," added Kook.

Justice minister Yossi Beilin said Katsav should not have insulted the Jewish Diaspora. "While I agree that everyone should live here, the president's statements will not make it more possible and will only distance us more from the Jews of the world," Beilin told the Jerusalem Post.

"The Jews of the Diaspora are not going anywhere. Our job is to ensure the continuation of the Jewish people – those living here and those living elsewhere," he said.

Israeli President Moshe Katsav

Moshe Kaveh, president of Bar-Ilan University, and Uri Dromi, publications director at the Israel Democracy Institute in Jerusalem, issued separate statements in response to Katsav's remarks.

"The ingathering of the exiles is a Jewish dream that is very much alive, but until then Bar-Ilan is committed to working with Jews around the world. We aren't prepared to give up on any Jew," said Kaveh in his statement.

"That Diaspora Jews should be told – by the highest figure in Israel – that the only legitimate place for Jews to live is Israel, is not only Israeli chutzpah, but also disrespect to, or ignorance of, the contributions of Diaspora Jewry to the Jewish heritage, with the Babylonian Talmud and Maimonides being just two examples," wrote Dromi.

Some of 'Iran 10' may be freed

After services Saturday, several congregants said they doubted Motamed was able to speak freely about conditions in Iran.

During his visit, Motamed was reunited with his mother and four sisters, all of whom live in Los Angeles. He also met privately with leaders of the U.S. Iranian Jewish community.

Motamed, who painted a generally sympathetic picture of Iranian President Mohammad Khatami in his address Saturday, also said he had asked U.S. Jewish leaders in New York not to press Iran to divulge what happened to 11 Jewish teenagers arrested some six years ago while trying to cross the border into Pakistan until the appeals in the Iran 10 case are resolved.

The 10 were sentenced in July to terms of four to 13 years. Three other Jews were acquitted of the charges.

A judiciary panel hearing the appeals of the prisoners has delayed its decision, which was slated for early September.

Motamed, who chose his words carefully Saturday, seemed to assert the prisoners' innocence.

"In our presence of 2,700 years in Iran, Jews have never betrayed Iran, and our roots are so deep that they cannot be cut off," said Motamed, 55.

Jewish emigration is also being increased by the government's refusal to employ Jews and other religious minorities, Motamed said.

Motamed himself continues to work for the government as a civil engineer and urban planner – "But not everyone is as lucky as I am," he said.

After meeting with Khatami, the Jewish community in Iran has been successful in regaining controls over Jewish schools, Motamed said, and there are hopes that property confiscated from the Jewish community and individuals will eventually be restored.

Motamed also said he was trying to facilitate travel to Iran for Iranian Jews now living abroad, but the suggestion was was not warmly received by Pooya Dayanim, spokesperson for the Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations, which sponsored Motamed's appearance at Saturday's service.

"I do not think we should encourage travel as long as Iran opposes Israel and the Middle East peace process," said Dayanim.

Most Jews to live in Israel in 2080: report

United States and Israel, as well as in the former Soviet Union, Europe, Latin America and other Jewish population centres throughout the world.

Based on existing data from studies commissioned independently by world Jewish communities, the report was authored by a trio of leading demographers from Hebrew University in Jerusalem: Sergio DellaPergola, Uzi Rebhun and Mark Tolts.

Jay Brodbar, director of research and assistant director of community planning and allocations for UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, questions the predictive value of such a study.

"I think trying to project close to 100 years in the future is not anything I would take seriously," said Brodbar, who had not seen the study.

In the early 1950s, he noted, the demise of Orthodoxy was predicted.

It is more instructive, he feels, to use such projects to illuminate current concerns.

The study portrays change over the next 80 years, as the composition of world Jewry surges in Israel and dwindles elsewhere in the world. As early as 2010, Israel and the United States – which currently is home to the largest number of Jews – are expected to be equal.

By the middle of the century, Israel will be home to the majority of the world's Jews, particularly Jewish youth. An estimated 77 to 86 percent of all Jews under the age of 15 will live in Israel by the year 2080.

Meanwhile, the percentage of elderly Jews in the Diaspora will continue to increase, especially as baby boomers reach 65 during the next 20 years. By 2080, for example, more than 40 percent of all Diaspora Jews will be 65 and over. However, the study predicts, some Jewish communities, such as those in the former Soviet Union, will be extinct by then.

The study's findings, which carry with them enormous political implications for the United States and Israel, may surprise the American Jewish community in particular.

"It's going to be a wake-up call," said Lawrence Grossman, editor of the American Jewish Yearbook. "American Jews are in a Golden Age. We've never had it so good. But there is a cloud on the horizon."

According to the study, the decline in numbers of Jews in North America is expected to accelerate after the 2030s. North America Jewry will make up an even larger share of the Diaspora Jewish population than it does today, as Jewish populations around the world outside of Israel will decrease.

Longer life expectancy, low fertility rates and diminished Jewish identification will likely be the chief causes of the plunge.

"The future demographic development of North American Jewry will depend on the present generation's ability to transmit a Jewish identity to the next," concluded the demographers in the study. "This will depend on ongoing patterns of marriage and child-rearing."

Results of the population study imply that a major alteration in the relationship between Israel and the Diaspora is under way, the report said.

As the number of Israeli Jews grows, the country will have to provide for its own economic well-being with less help from the Diaspora.

Israel will also take the lead in fostering Jewish educational and cultural continuity worldwide, as Diaspora Jews put their increasingly limited finances toward caring for their local communities.

Among the study's other projections:

- Jewish population worldwide is expected to grow from 13.1 million in 2000 to 15 million in 2080;
- Israel's Jewish population is expected to double over the next 80 years, increasing to more than 10 million;
- Diaspora Jewry will drop from 8.3 million in 2000 to 5.3 million in 2080;
- In the United States, the Jewish population will fall from 5.7 million in 2000 to 3.8 million in 2080; and
- The percentage of children under 15 is expected to range between 21 and 26 percent of the Jewish population in Israel – and between 11 and 16 percent of all Diaspora communities – by 2020.
- Also by 2020, the elderly population aged 65 and over will range between 14 and 16 percent in Israel, and between 24 and 27 percent in the Diaspora.
- In the former Soviet Union, assuming current fertility and emigration rates continue, the Jewish population will continue to plummet to between 2,000 and 3,000 in 2050 – and virtually none by 2080.

Going underground in search of the Temple Mount

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Tel Aviv architect and amateur archaeologist Tuvia Sagiv has some rather unconventional assumptions of where the holy Temple once stood.

Sagiv, who has devoted many years to investigating the whereabouts of the original Temple – destroyed in 70 A.C.E. by the Romans – rejects the claims of most investigators and rabbis, who believe the Temple stood where the Dome of the Rock now stands.

Instead of being located directly below the Dome of the Rock, as most scholars maintain, Sagiv believes the remnants of the great Temple are underneath the large plaza, somewhere between the Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aksa Mosque.

Sagiv further asserts that the Holy of Holies is underneath the circular water fountain between the two buildings, which dominate the plaza and the Old City.

Moreover, Sagiv has reached the conclusion that Mt. Moriah of today is not the mountain on which King Herod built the Temple in the first century BCE. Instead, he believes the Roman emperor, Hadrian, built Moriah, after quelling the Bar Kochba rebellion and exiling the Jews from Jerusalem in the second century BCE.

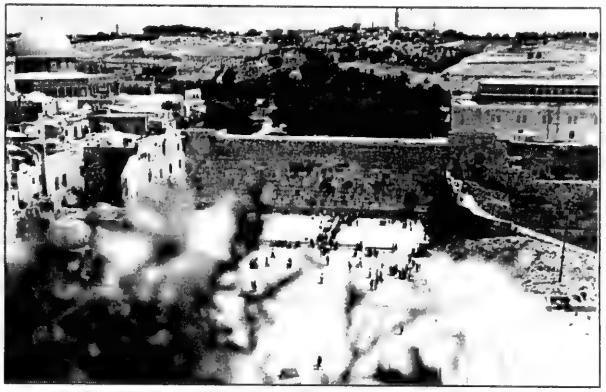
Hadrian, according to Sagiv, covered the remnants of the Jewish Temple, building around its relatively small peak the plaza which, we know today, is three times larger than the original Temple Mount.

The Herodian level, Sagiv asserts, is 16 metres beneath the current level of the plaza. The Dome of the Rock, he says, is not the site of the original Holy of Holies, but is actually the northern fortress, known as Antonia's Fortress, which protected the Temple from the north.

Sagiv reached his unconventional conclusions using an unconventional method. Instead of determining the original location of the Temple through identification of specific places in the sanctuary, like the altar or the Holy of Holies, Sagiv takes a visual approach. He compares what can be seen today with historical descriptions of what was visible then from the same place.

Sagiv's assumptions, based on many years of research, are all circumstantial, and some of his questions still remain unanswered. But while professional archaeologists dispute his conclusions, they have listened to him carefully for years; his methods have won legitimacy as one of the many systems archaeologists use to extrapolate meaning from the landscape.

Sagiv may be in the minority, but in the past there have been supporters of the idea that the Temple was south of the Dome of the Rock, rather than directly below it. One of the original directors of the British Expedition for the Investigation of the Holy Land, Guy Sergeson, thought so, but Charles Warren mocked him for it.



Temple Mount

Rabbi M. Braver, writing in Even Hato'in, made a similar claim, basing his assessment on the 13th-century writer, Ashtori Haparhi.

It would have all remained an esoteric argument between archaeologists if not for the new definition of sovereignty that some of the peace negotiators have started discussing: underground sovereignty.

According to a report, the latest idea regarding sovereignty considers dividing the Mount into four sections: the Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aksa Mosque; the plaza itself; the exterior walls; and the underground areas, each of which would get a different measure of sovereignty.

Israel, the report says, is only asking for sovereignty over the area underneath the plaza, where, perhaps, the original Temple Mount's remains are located.

Sagiv has used some advanced infra-red detection technology in his efforts to prove his point. At the southern wall, some 250 metres from the eastern corner of the plaza, the devices identified a thick, western-facing wall, which, Sagiv claims, is "the original Western Wall."

In the area where Sagiv believes the Holy of Holies was located – somewhere between the two main Muslim structures – the instruments revealed large, low, hollow areas and walls. His assumption is that if investigators were to dig 10 metres east from the Western Wall, as it is known to us now, they would reach the level of the original Temple, making it theoretically possible to uncover the remains of the original Temple without touching the mosques.

"It would be the proper thing to do historically, and it would get the idea out of the heads of some lunatics walking around that they have to blow up the mosques," he says.

He also calls for an examination of the undersides of the dozens of cisterns scattered in the area of the plaza to ascertain whether they reveal possible remains. "I don't care if it's UNESCO and not the Jews who do it, but it has to be done," he says.

Although his proposals have long been on the desks of the relevant government ministers, none seem likely to consider acting on the schemes. Acting Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami has already made it clear that while Israel is claiming sovereignty over the area beneath the Mount, it is a symbolic rather than a practical request, adding that nobody would be sent to excavate the area.

Plan would save leading rabbi's grave

By MAGNUS BENNETT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PRAGUE — The race is on to save and restore a cemetery that contains the remains of one of Judaism's most revered spiritual leaders of the 18th and 19th centuries.

For decades in the Slovak capital of Bratislava, the earthly remains of Rabbi Chatam Sofer and other leading Jewish figures have been shaken by the constant pounding of trolley cars passing directly overhead.

Because of the volume of traffic, local Jewish leaders feared that the cemetery could be damaged beyond repair.

But a $2 million project has now been launched that will not only divert the trolley car tracks away from the site, it will also convert Sofer's final resting place in the foothills of the Carpathian Mountains into a permanent mausoleum and tourist attraction.

Sofer, whose given name was Moshe, enjoyed an unrivaled reputation in Orthodox circles as a spiritual leader until his death at 76 in 1839.

The Torah interpretations and halachic rulings of the former chief rabbi of Pressburg – now Bratislava; at the time the most important Jewish community in Hungary – are still revered and studied around the world.

Albert Einstein and U.S. first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton are those who have visited the tomb over the years to pay their respects.

His remains were buried in a tomb surrounded by the graves of other leading rabbis and Jewish community leaders. But his peace was shattered during World War II, when the Nazi-puppet Slovak state decided to level the entire Jewish cemetery in order to construct a road.

Local Jewish leaders successfully fought to save the rabbi's grave – but it required a lot of good luck, according to Dr. Tomas Stern, a Slovak who has documented historical Jewish monuments throughout Central Europe.

"The grave of Chatam Sofer and other important rabbis happened to be at the bottom of a valley, so the authorities agreed to build the road over that section of the cemetery," he said.

Only 23 graves and 31 tombstones were saved from the bulldozers and encased in a concrete bunker beneath the road.

Years of neglect by Czechoslavakia's communist regime took its toll on Sofer's grave, as trams relentlessly shook his resting place.

But help eventually appeared in the form of New York city council member Noach Dear, who with the support of the White House, formed an international delegation to visit Bratislava and save Sofer's tomb.

> 'Prove a powerful magnet for tourists'

A deal was reached under which the Slovak government agreed to reroute the trolley cars at a total cost of $1.1 million. For its part, the delegation, which included New York businessman George Karfunkel and descendants of Sofer, vowed to restore the cemetery – a move that could cost as much as $1 million.

For Dear, an Orthodox Jew, the money will be well spent, whatever the cost.

"Chatam Sofer is someone everyone reveres," he said. "Every young child at a Hebrew school gets to know who Sofer was. You must preserve the gravesite of any great leader and rabbi like that."

But Dear and local Jewish leaders will have to wait longer than anticipated for the site to be preserved.

Bratislava's city hall had hoped to complete the new section of trolley track by this summer, but it has put back the completion date to at least October.

"We have come across several problems which have taken some time to get rid of," said Vladimir Lunacek, director of the city's transportation department. "One significant problem was ensuring the financing of the work."

Other problems have included red tape. City hall has had to secure 23 certificates from utility authorities in order to complete the project.

As a result, construction work on the mausoleum itself is now unlikely to start until the spring of next year, pushing back the completion date to next summer.

In the meantime, the trams continue to roll, prompting Bratislava's Jewish community leader, Peter Salner, to express concern.

"I hope the first part of the project can be carried out as soon as possible to prevent further damage to the cemetery," he said.

The Slovak ministry of culture and the city's Jewish community have already paid for the tombstones to be cleaned and preserved to prevent further decay in the humid, underground conditions.

Once the mausoleum is revamped, it is likely to prove a powerful magnet for tourists.

Earlier this month, 3,000 people visited the deteriorating site on Slovakia's European Day of Jewish Culture, making it the most visited Jewish monument in the country.

The project has been endorsed by Slovakia's Chief Rabbi Baruch Myers, who expressed his admiration of a man who defeated his opponents even in death.

"Sofer's grave has not moved for 160 years, standing firm through fascism and socialism," he said. "He was known as being resolute and immovable in his convictions, and even after his passing he shows that he does not move from his place."

Massacre at 1972 Olympics topic of well-researched book

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If there is any certainty about this month's summer Olympics in Australia, which got under way last week, it is that security at the Olympic Village in Sydney will be impeccably tight.

Twenty-eight years after the infamous Munich massacre, in which 11 Israeli athletes and coaches were killed in an orgy of violence, the Olympic organizing committee is taking no chances.

On the anniversary of this tragic event, which unfolded over a harrowing 20-hour period on Sept. 5, 1972, British journalist Simon Reeve has written One Day In September (Arcade Publishing), an exhaustively-researched account of the hostage-taking drama which deteriorated into an unmitigated nightmare. (A documentary film under the same title was recently released).

In telling this story, Reeve pulls no punches, accusing Germany of two counts of negligence. First, security was shockingly lax in the Olympic Village. This enabled a team of eight Palestinian terrorists from Black September to invade the compound and seize the Israelis. Second, the German police squad – dispatched to deal with the situation – was operationally ill-prepared to meet the challenge.

Golda Meir

Willy Brandt

That the massacre took place in Germany, just 27 years after the last embers of the Holocaust had died out, was supremely ironic. Dubbing the 1972 Olympics as "The Games of Peace and Joy," German officials hoped that it would confirm Germany's rehabilitation as a civilized nation. It was not to be.

Black September, formed after the expulsion of the PLO from Jordan in 1971, saw the Olympics as a golden opportunity to publicize the Palestinian cause and to demand the release of hundreds of Palestinians in Israeli prisons.

To this day, Abu Daoud, one of the leaders of Black September, claims that the intention was not to kill anyone, but to trade hostages for Palestinians.

In a bizarre twist, the commander of the Black September team, Abu Iyad, was half-Jewish, a militant whose mother was Jewish and whose father was Christian. He recruited the foot soldiers from Palestinian refugee camps in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, and code-named the attack Operation Ikrit and Biri'm, the names of two Arab villages in northern Israel which had been emptied of their inhabitants by the Israeli army during the 1948 War of Independence.

After a month of advanced military training in Libya, the attackers, armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles and grenades, had no trouble reaching the target, 31 Connollystrasse, the building in the centre of the Olympic Village where the Israeli sportsmen lived.

Unable to persuade the gunmen to surrender, the German government sought to work out a compromise, but to no avail. Golda Meir, Israel's prime minister, was adamant that there would be no deal with terrorists.

Further pressure was exerted when Avery Brundage, the American head of the International Olympic Committee, demanded that the crisis be defused by whatever means.

Feeling the heat, several German officials, including the minister of interior, offered to exchange themselves for the hostages. Two of them, Moshe Weinberg, a wrestling coach, and Yossef Romano, a weightlifter, had already been shot to death by the Palestinians.

Convinced that the terrorists would murder the rest of the hostages, Meir ordered an elite army commando unit to prepare to fly to Germany. The commandos never left Israel. Although the Germans had no counter-terrorist force, they rejected Israel's offer of help, saying they could handle the problem.

In an effort to forestall bloodshed, Chancellor Willy Brandt phoned President Anwar Sadat of Egypt and asked him to intervene. Sadat, refusing to speak to him, referred Brandt to the prime minister, who was powerless to act.

Germany's rescue plan called for the terrorists and the hostages to be flown in two helicopters to an air field near Munich and then put aboard a German plane waiting to take them to a neutral country.

In reality, the Germans never intended to let them leave. Their plan was to pick off the terrorists one by one. But the snipers' guns were not fitted with telescopic sights and the level of their marksmanship was lamentable. Zvi Zamir, the Mossad director who witnessed the proceedings, was astonished at the Germans' ineptitude.

Once the firing began, chaos ensued. Amid the fog of confusion, nine Israelis, five Palestinians and one German were killed in the shootout. Reuters, in an egregiously inaccurate newsflash, reported that the standoff had ended peacefully. One can imagine how the wives and children of the hostages felt when Reuters released a correction just hours later.

By way of retaliation, Israel struck back, hitting PLO bases in Lebanon in two massive raids on Sept. 8 and 16 and subsequently hunting down PLO representatives and leaders in Europe and the Middle East.

As a result of the events in Munich, the Israeli delegation at the 1976 Montreal Olympics was zealously guarded by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Since then, no effort has been spared to ensure the safety of all Olympians. But the pain which the Palestinians inflicted on the Israelis almost three decades ago still festers like an open wound.

BERLIN MUSEUM REPAIRS 14TH-CENTURY ERFURT BIBLE

Regarded as one of the world's most important Hebrew manuscripts, the 14th-century Erfurt Bible is the focus of a $250,000 rescue effort more than half a century after it was severely damaged during World War II.

A possession of the Berlin State Library, the two-volume Bible is the largest known Hebrew manuscript. It weighs 50 kilograms and consists of 1,068 large goatskin pages. It contains text in both Hebrew and Aramaic, as well as commentary and ornamented pages with micrographic illustrations.

"This is a unique Jewish cultural artefact and an extraordinary textual, material and artistic product of Ashkenazi heritage," said Malachi Beit-Arie, professor of codicology and palaeography at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, who examined the Bible last winter.

"It is impossible to exaggerate the need to restore the damaged manuscript to its original glory."

In the past eight months, conservators have restored about one-third of the manuscript, which sustained fire and water damage after an Allied bombing raid on Berlin in February, 1945.

The Erfurt Bible was named after the town of Erfurt, where it was kept in a monastery for five centuries after the destruction of the Thuringian Jewish communities in 1349. It was commissioned by a Rabbi Shalom, of whom nothing precise is known.

The manuscript, which remained in East German archives after the war, was displayed in an exhibition on Jewish life and culture in West Berlin in 1991. "It was one of the most valuable and magnificent pieces of the exhibition," says Andreas Nachama, who was curator of that exhibition and is now the head of Berlin's Jewish community.

A team of conservators have experimented for months over the best methods of removing the animal glue from the manuscript, and of flattening the curled pages without damaging them or causing the ink to flake off. Over time, they devised a method of flattening the pages using weights.

"We needed an unbelievable number of test runs, because every piece of parchment reacts differently," says chief conservator Margit Hundertmark. She says the work may be concluded by year's end.

Play Returns: Tarragon Theatre is mounting a new production of Sibs, the comedic play by Diane Flacks and Richard Greenblatt that won strong reviews when the Toronto theatre premiered it last March.

As before, playwrights Flacks and Greenblatt appear, along with Rick Sacks, in this expressionistic exploration of the complex relations between brother and sister. The play is anchored in the poignant aftermath of a parent's death and the ceremonial Jewish shivah, and flashes back through many layers of family history.

Memoir recounts survival as Christian in Nazi Germany

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

This story was published in last week's CJN; but due to a production error, some of the text was missing.

David Makow, a retired research scientist at the National Research Council in Ottawa, has published Dangerous Luck, a memoir of how he, a Jew from Urdezow, survived the Holocaust disguised as a Gentile in a German work camp.

The book, whose full title is Dangerous Luck: Memories of A Hunted Life, was published in hardcover by Shengold Publishers of New York.

In his memoir, Makow clearly relates his experiences as a teenager in 1939, and the choices he was forced to make as the Nazis' fine-meshed net came down all around him. Central to his survival was his decision to flee into Germany itself, where he passed himself off as a Christian Pole named Mieszczyslaw Wosko, and was put to work as a painter in the Lager Vogelgesang.

In this camp, he and another hidden Jew discover each other and secretly provide moral support to each other. "Aware that it might be dangerous to be seen together often, we arranged our meetings discretely. We needed to be in touch, as there was nobody else we could trust."

But when the other Jew fled after his identity was discovered, Makow never heard of him again.

Unfortunately, another inmate also knew that Makow was Jewish, and said to him: "If you will give me your bread, margarine and cigarettes I will not tell anybody." After negotiations, Makow made regular payments of cigarettes to the blackmailer.

Fiercely anti-Semitic, many camp inmates supported the Nazis' efforts to destroy the Jews. Some suspected Makow of being Jewish and tried several times to incriminate him. Keeping his head, he always managed to throw off these suspicions.

Having a scientific bent, Makow was soon put to work as a mathematician and architectural draftsman. Sitting alone at a desk, he soon began to study English in secret. After three months of study, he suddenly began speaking to his Dutch friend, Otto, in English. "(Otto) was amazed," Makow writes. "He answered and I understood him. These were the first spoken English sentences I had ever heard and the first English words I spoke aloud to anybody."

On the morning of May 8, 1945, Makow and the other prisoners discovered that the German guards had fled and the camp was wide open. About a third of the book is devoted to the tale of his post-war survival, his marriage in Switzerland, his arrival in Canada and the establishment of his new life here where he was hired by the National Research Council of Canada to work in the burgeoning field of radio astronomy..

In an epilogue, Makow waxes philosophical, asking the inescapable, albeit unanswerable, question, "Why did I survive?" Noting that our lives are unpredictably influenced by the actions of others, he writes: "It appears to me that life on earth is one giant interconnected organism, the destiny of each individual being interrelated to others in a random manner. The saying that a butterfly flapping its wings in Beijing causes a storm in Texas could apply equally well to our own lives."

At 120 pages, Dangerous Luck is a simple, well-told tale of survival and a valuable addition to our store of first-person testimony about the Holocaust.

NOTES FROM ALL OVER

New York Jewish Museum: If you missed the exhibition of 400 gouaches by Charlotte Salomon (1917-1943) which drew much journalistic praise after its recent appearance at the Art Gallery of Ontario, take heart.

Charlotte Salomon: Life? Or Theatre? opens Dec. 10 at the Jewish Museum in New York and remains on view through March 25, 2001.

Paris Jewish Museum: The Musée d'art et d'histoire du Judaïsme offers a variety of Yiddish-oriented activities through Oct. 9. Activities include an exhibition of Jewish posters from Poland between the wars, 300 postcards from "the Yiddishland," and a display of a Yiddish glove puppet theatre.

From Nov. 14 through March 5, 2001, the museum presents an exhibit of works by Vienna-born artist Friedl Dicker-Brandeis (1898-1944), who was interned at Terezin and died at Birkenau. In the same period, the museum presents Conversation, an installation by Israeli sculptor Micha Ullman.

Imperial War Museum: It is not well known that London's Imperial War Museum features a permanent Holocaust exhibition some 1,200 square metres in size. Four years in the making, the exhibition covers two floors and features many rare and important objects, some from former concentration and extermination camp museums in Germany, Poland and Ukraine.

One such item is the typewriter from Raoul Wallenberg's office upon which he typed protective passes for Hungarian Jews.

The exhibition focuses on all the groups that suffered Nazi persecution, including the Roma, Poles, Soviets, people with disabilities, homosexuals and prisoners of conscience. The museum's brochure points out that the exhibition brings "to a British audience for the first time the history of the Nazis' brutality towards those groups they considered inferior."

El Al News: Israel's national airline, El Al, has set up an English-Hebrew Web site (www.elal.com) that lists departure and arrival times, updated at 15 minute intervals. The site also allows frequent flyers to check the number of points they have accumulated. El Al maintains two frequent flyers clubs. Matmid (the name means "frequent" in Hebrew) is for those who travel to Israel at least three times a year, while the Loyal Club is for those who go once or twice. The Loyal Club also permits members of the same household to pool their points.

According to Rami Fischer, general manager for El Al in Canada, approximately 60 percent of the airline's business in Canada involves groups, both Christian and Jewish. It's an interesting statistic, and likely reflects the predominance of church, synagogue and other institutional groups from Canada to Israel.

As Fischer points out, El Al offers excellent connections to Egypt, Greece, Turkey and Jordan at competitive prices. Contact the El Al office in Toronto at 416-967-4222 or toll-free 1-800-361-6174.

Computers can not replace doctors, panel told

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A panelist's suggestion that medical tests done on the Internet, transmitted to a database and interpreted by computers could replace doctors by 2020 was vigorously opposed by a physician on the same panel.

"The treatment of a patient is an art," said Dr. Joseph Minkowitz, chief cardiologist at Markham Stouffville Hospital. "If you depend on computers, [patients] will die at your feet."

He was responding to a statement by Steven Handler, director of the Community Care Access Centre (CCAC) in North York. Handler had said that in 20 years, technology will be advanced enough to replace doctors. "We're close to doing it now," he said.

They were taking part in a recent forum at Terrace Garden Retirement Residence on the subject: What health care will be left for seniors in 2020?

Ettie Goldenstein, executive director of Bikur Cholim, a Jewish volunteer agency, and David Young, Conservative MPP for Willowdale, were the other panelists. All four agreed that by 2020, the present health care system will be unable to bear the cost of treating the baby boomers who will then be seniors.

Complaining that the present system "strips patients of their dignity," Minkowitz said it is not geared to look after seniors properly.

He said he would favour letting an 80-year-old who still works and plays golf have a cardiac bypass.

The cardiac surgeon also complained that there is an attempt to refer to patients as clients. "A client has options, but when a patient comes to me, it is for treatment."

He also contested a statement by moderator Fran Wolfe, regional director of hospital and community relations for Central Park Lodges, that baby boomers like herself are saving money for their health care.

"Baby boomers are spending everything and not thinking about their health care in the future," Minkowitz said.

There are such phenomenal developments in medicine ahead that it will not be unusual for a 95-year-old to get dressed and go out to dinner as a younger person would today.

"Seniors are not satisfied at sitting back at age 70," he said. "They are demanding, 'How do we get treated?' Senior citizens are not to be written off."

Goldenstein related case histories of ill seniors who have decided to stay at home despite the risk and are not getting enough home care. One case involved a husband and wife who had promised each other that they would never agree to let either of them go into a nursing home. The wife required a wheelchair and help in bathing and dressing, which the husband could not provide. He was not strong enough to lift his wife into the wheelchair. This couple was not getting enough home care from the CCAC, she said.

The budget of CCAC of North York allows only 17½ hours a month in home care, Handler said.

"Ontario is the only province in Canada which gives home care free," he added.

In reply, Young said the Ontario government is spending $4 billion more on health care than five years ago. "Medicare is so hot an issue right now that every party has ducked it, and I'll include my own party," said Young. "But we do have a plan, a new vision for the future."

But two-thirds of all hospital days today are occupied by people over 65, Handler said. By 2020, "there will be a growing trend to privatization, people will pay for their own treatment, and public representation will be scaled down."

New Branson centre opens doors

TORONTO — The new Community Care Centre to treat urgent medical problems recently opened at the Branson Division of North York General Hospital (NYGH).

The centre replaces the Branson Division emergency department, as part of a hospital-wide reorganization of patient services, according to hospital sources.

The Community Care Centre to treat urgent medical problems is open seven days a week from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m. It looks after the vast majority of patients who visit emergency departments with problems such as broken bones, sprains, cuts, asthma, coughs and bronchitis, earaches, stomach pains, mental health issues, allergic reactions and skin rashes.

The Branson site centre will help reduce the pressure on local emergency departments, said Tim Rutledge, chief of NYGH's emergency services.

"Our focus is on fast, efficient and high quality care of urgent medical problems," he said. "The staff can assess and treat people faster because they won't be busy looking after critically ill patients."

If a patient has a more serious problem that requires admission to a hospital, Rutledge added, they will be transferred to NYGH's emergency department at the hospital's Leslie and Sheppard site.

Israeli Olympians dreaming of top finishes

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Twenty-year-old Or Tokayev can't remember the first time she won a rhythmic gymnastics competition. Tokayev has been participating in the sport since she was five and has won so often that she can't remember which ribbon or trophy belongs to which championship.

But if Tokayev wins at the Olympics, she says she will definitely remember it.

"It has been my dream to go to the Olympics. It's very exciting to be a participant," she said.

Tokayev is one of 40 athletes representing Israel at this year's Games. The Israeli delegation to the Olympics is the country's biggest and most promising group of athletes since 1952, when the state first participated in the sporting event.

The hype in Israel suggests the country expects its athletes to bring home a gold medal. Israel has three medals to its name so far. Yael Arad won Israel's first ever medal – a silver – at the1992 Barcelona Olympics and fellow judoka Oren Smadja brought home the bronze. In 1996, Gal Friedman won a bronze medal in windsurfing.

Pole-vaulter Alex Averbukh is Israel's best hope for a gold this time around. Before setting out for Sydney, the 25-year-old Siberian-born immigrant – who became the first Israeli medal-winner in a World Athletics Championship when he won a bronze medal in Seville last year with a jump of 5.80 metres – said he was "going for gold."

Kayaker Michael Kalganov and windsurfer Amit Inbar are the two other Olympians touted to win medals this year.

Kalganov, 25, has twice won the gold medal in the K1 200-metre race at the World Championships in 1998 and 1999. At the European Championships in Poland in July, he won a gold medal in the K1 1000-metre and a silver medal in the K1 500-metre races.

Inbar, 28, is one of Israel's best athletes, and also a press favourite. He won the silver medal in the European championships in May. Leading up to the Olympics, Inbar graced more covers of Israeli magazines than any other athlete on the Olympic team. He also joined Tokayev in modelling the team's uniforms.

Or Tokayev

And while a medal is always nice, Israeli athletes are still relatively new to the international professional sports scene.

"If we win a medal, of course that would make me happy, but if there are many athletes in the finals, that means Israeli sports has advanced a considerable amount," Israel Olympic Committee chair Zvi Varshaviak told The Jerusalem Post. "Fourth place is still fourth best in the world. Even 10th in the world is great. Anyone who gets to the top 10 is a big hero in my eyes, even if [he or she doesn't] put [his or her] face on the cover of a cereal box."

Tokayev's coach, Natalya Usmolov, agreed. "I don't think we'll get a medal, we're hoping to finish in the top 10, that would be high for Israel. We'd like to keep our strong standing at 12th," said Usmolov.

Team captain Rogel Nahum, 33, is aiming for the finals, rather than a medal. "My main goal is to first qualify into the final, before thinking of a medal," says the triple jumper, who missed the finals in his first two trips to the Olympics.

Nahum trained with Olympian Jon Edwards during the year. "To train with a training partner helps in itself... Especially if he's a world record holder," he said. "We motivate one another. We're good friends. The competition is within the friendship."

With the likes of Bruny Surin and Michael Johnson running against them, Nahum's track and field teammates, Kfir Golan, 26, Alex Porkhomovsky, 28, Tommy Kafri, 23, and Gidon Yablonka, 22, have more than friendly competition headed their way. While a medal is beyond their reach, making it to the finals in the 4 x 100-metre race would more than satisfy these runners.

"We expect to get to the semi finals, but we really want to make it into the finals," said Yablonka.

Israelis, who have been glued to their television sets, also expect many of their athletes to get to the finals. Though Israel has been to the Olympics before, this is definitely its strongest delegation.

Its first delegation to the Helsinki Games in 1952 was the country's way of putting itself on the sports map. Springboard diver Yoav Ra'anan finished ninth.

Israel made no headlines in the Summer Olympics of 1956 (Melbourne), 1960 (Rome), 1964 (Tokyo), or 1968 (Mexico City). Then, at the 1972 Munich Olympics tragedy struck and Israeli athletes were unfortunately thrust into the media spotlight.

At that time, 11 members of the Israeli delegation were murdered by Palestinian terrorists in what has been described as the greatest disaster in the history of the modern Olympics.

Amid much controversy, Sydney Games organizers rejected the proposal to have a moment of silence during the opening ceremony, saying such a memorial is considered a political act.

"It's a shame [the Olympics officials won't] commemorate the Munich massacre," team captain Nahum said. "At all of the Olympic Games there should be an event to remember the tragedy...you should always remember it, especially for the next generation."

The Sydney Games, on the other hand, does have a plaque bearing the 11 names of the murdered athletes on display just outside the main Olympic stadium.

Despite the Munich tragedy, Israel returned to the 1976 Summer Games in Montreal. Esther Roth-Shachamarov placed sixth in the 100-metre hurdles, clinching the best national track result to date. When Flying Dutchmen Yoel Sela and Eldad Amir landed in fourth place at Seoul in 1988, despite forfeiting a race held on Yom Kippur, Israel's medal hopes seemed suddenly attainable. Then came judoka Arad.

"These are a special group of athletes and coaches," said Arad. "I feel the same magic as I did my year."

Sailor recalls his Olympic experiences

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back in 1960, way before Jackie Mason ever dreamed of making jokes about Jews in boats, Jerry Conway was taking a lot of flack for being a Jew in a boat.

Unlike the yacht club yokels in the Mason shtick, Conway wasn't worrying about the number of visitors his boat could sleep.

Sleeping on a boat was the furthest thing from his mind. In his heyday, Conway was a competitive sailor who represented the Island Yacht Club (IYC), Toronto's mainly Jewish sailing fraternity, in races on Lake Ontario. The flack he got for being in a boat came from anti-Semitic rivals who taunted him and his crew mates during important sailing events.

"It was pretty grim back then. There was a lot of anti-Semitism," Conway, 63, recalled.

Well before the days of human rights codes and complaints commissioners, Conway and his buddies knew of one way to take revenge.

Conway and his Jewish skipper, Mel Gould, along with teammate Barclay Livingstone, defeated all challengers – including the most vocal of the racists – and earned the right to represent Canada at the 1960 Olympic Games in Rome. They sailed their boat, Saga II, in the now extinct 5½-metre competition that was held in the Bay of Naples. A year or two earlier, the threesome had taken the boat to the Pan Am Games in Chicago and won a silver medal in the same event.

Chicago was nice but it's the Olympics in Rome that Conway recalls 40 years later with fond nostalgia. As Canadian athletes make their own memories in Sydney, Conway can't help think about the experiences of his youth.

"The one thing that stands out was standing in the centre of the stadium during the opening ceremonies, with every country's athletes," he said. "Then they released the doves. An incredible roar went up from the crowd and from the athletes. Everyone was caught up in the greatness of the event, being there and participating in it."

Adding to the almost mystical aura of the '60 Games was the city of Rome itself. It was Conway's first trip to Europe and the 23-year-old felt it was as close to being to ancient Greece as could be possible in modern times.

"With the amphitheatre, the stadia, the statues, you had a sense of history and of being part of a tradition that went back many, many years," he said.

The competition itself was somewhat disappointing for the Canadian crew. They finished near the bottom of the 20-team event, owing in large part to their boat's out-of-date maritime technology. The top teams, Americans and Brits mostly, had much faster boats, he recalled.

When it came time to race, the Canadians would jump into the lead. They'd go all out and be mistake-free, but the Americans in their more modern boats would inexorably gain on them and pass them by.

Despite the disappointment on the water, Conway, who operated the forward, jib sail, has other great Olympian memories. When the team relocated to Rome, he was billeted with Harry Jerome, Canada's famed sprinter and one of the fastest men of the 1960s.

The Olympics marked Conway's high water mark in sailing competition. He continued to sail recreationally afterwards and today he's more of a cruiser than a racer. But nothing could compare to his Olympic experience.

Jewish centre opens in Auschwitz shadow

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

OSWIECIM — A prayer and study centre honouring Jewish life has opened near the place that for more than half a century has been the paramount symbol of Jewish death.

Jordan's Prince Hassan recently joined Roman Catholic clergy, Polish, U.S. and Israeli officials and Holocaust survivors in an emotional ceremony dedicating the Auschwitz Jewish Centre in Oswiecim – the town outside which the infamous Nazi death camp was built.

The centre complex, which includes study, prayer and educational facilities, encompasses the lone remaining synagogue in Oswiecim – the Chevra Lomdei Mishnayot Synagogue – which has been fully restored. It is the only active Jewish institution near the site of the Auschwitz death camp.

"There is, in today's ceremony, a message of hope, of tikvah," said Hassan, who attended the ceremony in his capacity as moderator of the World Conference of Religion and Peace.

"After survival comes revival," he said. "The message here is that death is not the end of life."

Hassan, the brother of the late King Hussein, noted that he was aware of the "delicate nature" of his participation in the ceremony. But "further understanding through sharing in our common humanity is a duty of conscience," he added.

Former Knesset speaker Shevach Weiss, a Holocaust survivor from Poland who is now chair of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem, hugged Hassan warmly and welcomed his presence.

"The fact that you are here with us is a symbol of the continuity of making peace," he said. "It means solidarity with the present time and understanding of what happened in the past."

The $10 million Auschwitz Centre project was conceived and sponsored by the New York-based Auschwitz Jewish Centre Foundation, founded in 1995 by philanthropist and businessman Fred Schwartz.

Its aim is to "commemorate the victims of the Holocaust and mourn their loss, not by showing how they died – but how they lived, focusing on the life, culture and history of the pre-war Jewish community of Oswiecim as a microcosm of destroyed European Jewry," said Schwartz.

"The camps represent the anonymity and mechanics of death," Schwartz told JTA before the ceremony. "Our centre counters this anonymity."

The centre also hopes to establish itself as a positive, living Jewish presence near the place that is the world's biggest Jewish cemetery and the ultimate symbol of the Shoah. There are more than 40 Catholic institutions in the area.

"This synagogue is a testament to the vibrant souls who lived life to the fullest within its walls," said Michael Lewan, chair of the U.S. Commission for the Preservation of America's Heritage Abroad, a co-sponsor of the project.

"Today, Oswiecim has reconciled with its past in an act of love, an act of peace," he said.

The Chevra Lomdei Mishnayot Synagogue was restored to how it looked in the 1930s, when the town's 7,000 Jews made up more than half of the local population and Oswiecim was widely known among Jews by its Yiddish name, Oshpitsin.

The building attached to the synagogue, once the home of local Jews, includes an auditorium, an exhibition on Jewish life in Oswiecim, and a family history centre where people can trace their ancestry through computer databases.

The walls of the complex are adorned with historic photographs of Oswiecim Jews and pre-war scenes of the town.

"My grandparents came from Oswiecim and had a most marvellous childhood here," said Lucia Goodhart of Baltimore, who attended the ceremony.

"During the ceremony I felt my heart beating out of my chest. From despair, I have serious feelings of hope.

"Opening this centre represents not only a rejuvenation but a restoration of relationships. It is a justification that we lived here."

About Life

Dear Ella,

Here comes Rosh Hashanah again, and here comes all the work that goes with it. I don't understand why every Jewish holiday revolves around food.

I have been blessed with a wonderful large family. Every holiday we all get together, my boys, their wives and the kids. I spend a month before each holiday planning menus, cooking and freezing. The evening of the holiday and after shul are spent eating at my home. I have to set the table, take everything out to warm up and serve it all. It gets eaten in 10 minutes, the gang all retires to the living room and then the clean up starts. I clean the table, put leftovers away, wash pots, pans and dishes. How I long to hear the words "I'll wash, you dry" come out of somebody's mouth. By the time I'm finished, I come out to the living room to enjoy my family and one of my sons inevitably says, "It's getting late ma, the kids are tired. See you tomorrow." Help!!

Food Fest

Dear Food Fest

I think you are suffering from the "Mother has to do everything syndrome." Your family is long overdue for a meeting. This should not go on again, even for one meal!

It is wonderful that you have a large family and that you work so hard to bring the closeness and spirit of the holiday into your home, but you better start enlisting the help of some of the troops. You've made it so comfortable, they don't even notice the work that goes into these get-togethers.

You have to let them know that you love doing this for everyone, but you are too tired to do it all alone. When dinner is over, appoint someone to clear the table, help put the food away and help with the dishes. The clean up will be done in no time and you can enjoy the rest of the evening with your family. Next holiday, you should assign part of the menu to each family member.

You are an amazing woman to have kept this up for so many years. It's time to pass some of it along.

Shanah Tovah.

The Campaign For Our Children - Project #2

All our children deserve to grow up free from violence

Refuge From Harm

For victims of domestic abuse, physical survival is just the first step. When one round of violence stops, where do you go to prevent another? Our community helps to provide an emergency apartment in a Jewish neighbourhood for women and their children escaping abuse. The cost of sheltering them from danger is all our responsibility.

That's why UJA FEDERATION Campaign 2001 is a special initiative – The Campaign For Our Children. Our goal is $45 million – four million more than last year – with additional donations designated for kids in need. Your increased contribution will ensure a refuge from harm for parents and children trapped in abusive situations.

Emergency housing for victims of abuse. It's just one of more than a dozen projects planned by The Campaign For Our Children to help children at risk, bring our kids closer to Jewish life and rescue Jews from oppression and anti-Semitism.

The Campaign For Our Children. Because your reasons for giving are growing!

FARBRENGEN

A little nosh for the soul

WHY DID WE CREATE THIS ISSUE OF FARBRENGEN?

Everything that is created exists first as a thought, even a formless one. For that thought to take shape, it must be articulated either in speech or in deed. Whether sublime or mundane, an act of creativity is the purest expression of the soul.

What is the source of the creative process that surrounds us? How does creativity manifest itself each moment of our lives?

The Talmud says, "By ten things is the world created, by wisdom and by understanding, by reason and by strength, by rebuke and by might, by righteousness and by judgment, by loving kindness and compassion." (Hagiga 12a)

It is by these ten things—and by their myriad levels of meaning—that humankind creates. In this issue of Farbrengen we explore various facets of creativity, the power of thought and its creative manifestation.

You will read about a scientist and a rabbi, apricots and a king, the waters of Ein Gedi and the rituals of Rosh Hashanah. There are essays and stories about fathers and birthing and the relativity of time. Our Kaballa Komix illustrates the ten steps (sefirot) of Creation. One of them—malchut—is referred to by the first Chabad Rebbe, Schneur Zalman of Liadi, as the manifestation of Divine thought through which the world was created. (Tanya II: 11-12)

The ultimate goal is to unite our soul with its divine source by creating the best self that each of us can become. Thoughts, dreams, poetry, music, study, prayer and art are expressions of this process. We manifest who we are by what we become, and through everything which comes from us.

Few things in life compare to the joy and fulfillment of creating something that has not been there before and only now exists because of you. On the sixth day, after every other being was already in existence, Adam and Eve were created and commanded to "be fruitful and multiply." This mandate has many meanings and profound implications—there are many souls to be created and there is much for them to create.

Rosh Hashanah is the birthday of Adam and Eve. It is the ultimate celebration of creation itself. It is the time when we reflect upon our ability to re-fashion our existence—each year anew. It is for this reason that Rosh Hashanah is an appropriate time for Teshuva. Although persistently misinterpreted as "repentance," Teshuva simply means to "return"—to our inherent and highest self.

It is the time to celebrate humankind. Adam and Eve were blessed with the G-dlike ability to fashion the world and to reveal its spirituality. On Rosh Hashanah we celebrate not only the birthday of Adam and Eve but also the creative powers we inherited from them.

Happy Birthday!

MAKING ART WORK

The accolades are a result of a career that has included working on such products as: "E.T.," "Jaws II," "Sophie's Choice," "Braveheart," "Batman," "Tiny Toons," "Jurassic Park" and "Mission Impossible." But none of it means as much to him as spending an afternoon with the kids at Children's Hospital, or helping to create Farbrengen.

AN INTERVIEW WITH RON ASCHER

by Stanley Goldstein

How do you differentiate between comercial art and fine art?

Any commissioned art is commercial; it's done with a purpose, a goal. Rembrandt was a commercial artist in his day.

In good commercial art there is a gift, an energy, a spark on the creative level that meshes with a clear awareness of marketing and psychology. All that is focused and channeled into the commercial goal—buy more cottage cheese, come see my movie, test drive my car. Fine art comes from the artist's need to express whatever it is that drives him personally. Maybe the work sells, maybe not. When people of the day bought the works of Matisse and Mondrian– which were originally painted from the soul—they created more along those lines because it paid the bills. Picasso's Guernica was politically motivated, from the heart; it was him screaming in outrage over what was happening, and was never duplicated. So many pieces that today we consider fine art, high art—not to say they're not —were done for a price.

How do you separate who you are from what you're working on?

You don't, it's all part of the creative process.

Time and experience have given me certain tools, and a certain facility, but the most valuable things are the wisdom and humility to get out of the way when it's happening. Because I'm not doing it. When people ask, "Where does it come from, how do you do it?"—I tell them it's not me, it comes from what I call the magic pencil. It can carry you for years, one instant at a time.

Most often a concept comes as a flash, just the germ of an idea. But when you pick up the "magic pencil," the veil lifts, the filters are removed, and things start to take form and take shape very quickly. The real power is in getting out of the way.

That is something I am profoundly humbled by and grateful for. I may have ego and maybe a little cockiness in some areas, but this isn't one of them.

What path led you to become an Art Director?

I started out freelancing for companies like Seagrams, Sony and a lot of others you've never heard of—like the muffler shop on the corner. Somebody suggested I try the movie studios. One thing led to another until I ended up working out of a graphics studio as an independent. They had a lot of entertainment accounts, and it was really exciting and fun. I wound up taking on a little account nobody else wanted called Telepictures.

Well, Telepictures grew and decided to open an in-house art department. They asked me to run it. I had a sense of loyalty to the people I was working with, so I said, "Let me think about it." They said, "Well you can think about it, but what we're telling you is that either way, we're taking our account with us."

Telepictures eventually merged with Lorimar. Then Warner Bros. came on the scene and bought Lorimar-Telepictures before merging with Time-Life. I ended up as Senior Art Director of Creative Services, Marketing and Promotions.

What is most the difficult aspect of commercial art design?

Knowing when to put the brush down when things are cooking. For a designer, the real joy is in making it happen in the first place, making that "comp" work.

The other side of the equation is when things work for off-the-wall reasons... At a marketing concept meeting for "E.T.," tons of pencil concepts were being kicked around. It was all getting a little crazy. To lighten things up I had a gag concept, a Michelangelo rip-off, I tossed onto the table. It struck something in other people's minds... They didn't see the schmaltz and ran with it... I only meant it as a joke for crying out loud!

What is the feeling when it all works?

Excitement, exhilaration and exuberance on one side, and profound humility on the other. It's such a charge when things click and come together. The "magic pencil" is the gift. Humility and gratitude is the acknowledgement that you're just a channel, not the source.

One of the most profound realizations I ever came across in all of my struggling and groping and looking for some explanation for the magnificence and madness that's all around us is, "Shema Yisroel Hashem Elokeinu, Hashem Echad." [Hear O Israel, the L-rd is our G-d, the L-rd is One.]

One. It's not just a number. It's a statement of Unity. It's a very profound unity, the synchronicity, the Oneness and interconnectedness of everything. Whether we understand it or not isn't important. It is the source. To do what we need to do, we must have the illusion of separateness. And the wisdom to know that it is only an illusion.

The Neshama of Foreign Policy

Al Gore and a book called the Tanya

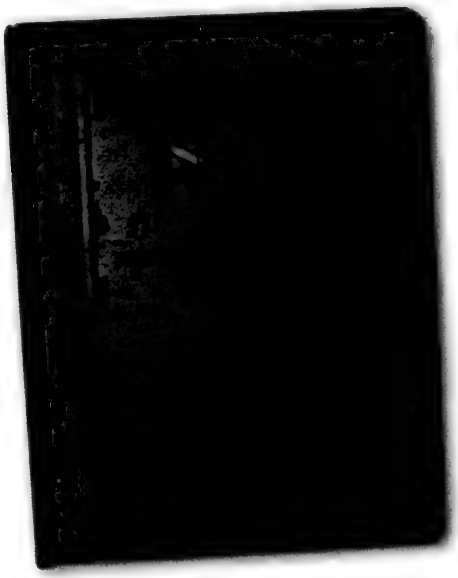
by Leon S. Fuerth, National Security Advisor to Vice President Al Gore



Originally a gift to the Lubavitcher Rebbe, now a gift to humanity.

For twenty years, I've had the honor of serving as an advisor on national security issues to Al Gore. During his career in the House, the Senate, and the White House, the Vice President has seized many opportunities to try to make the world a better place. While we all may strive toward this goal in our own way, a Vice President is in the unique position of having an especially strong influence on events—and many of these efforts never make headlines. I'd like to share a brief story about one of these little-known efforts.

In December 1993, Al Gore made his first official visit to Russia as Vice President. This trip presented a key opportunity for the new Administration to establish a dialogue with the Russian government and lay out its goals for the relationship between our two nations. As we flew to the meeting with Boris Yeltsin, we reviewed the many issues on our agenda. In addition to a host of sweeping geopolitical concerns, we also planned to address a smaller, more personal item—the return of the Schneerson collection, a library of 12,000 texts seized by the Russians during the Bolshevik Revolution.

The year was 1917 in the city of Lubavitch, Russia, and religious books were being torched to ashes during an anti-Jewish pogrom. To prevent the destruction of many sacred texts dating back to the Baal Shem Tov, Rabbi Sholom Dov Ber of Lubavitch sent 12,000 books from his library to a storehouse in Moscow for safekeeping.

Unfortunately, the Bolshevik authorities seized the books from the storehouse and locked them in the state-controlled Lenin Library.

This forced confiscation represented a serious injustice. The books had little value to the Soviet authorities, but they represented a key part of the Jewish spiritual heritage. Soon afterwards, the Rebbe, his family, and followers fled the ongoing persecution in Russia and emigrated to the United States. Then, as American citizens, the Schneerson family began a long effort to reclaim their precious legacy so they could share it with the Jewish people and the world at large.

Since the 1940's, the American government has urged the authorities in Moscow to return these books to their rightful owners. Al Gore actively pursued this issue in the Senate in the early 1990's, working in cooperation with the Bush Administration and emerging as a leader of a bipartisan effort. Gore passed legislation conditioning some Russian aid on the return of the books, and later made sure that Russia's Smolensk archives—currently stored in the U.S. National Archives—would not be sent back to Moscow until the release of the Schneerson collection.

Before his trip to Moscow in 1993, Vice President Gore reaffirmed his commitment to this cause and made it clear to the Russians that he hoped for immediate progress. On his visit to the Lenin Library, the Vice President gained access to view the captive books.

Unimpressed by the way the books were treated in the library, he passed up a photo opportunity arranged by the staff. Later, the Vice President was offered a token of goodwill: the Russians said that a single text of his choosing would be returned to the custody of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. The Vice President chose a book called the Tanya.

I'll never forget that book—it has a worn leather cover bearing engraved Hebrew letters, and its yellowing pages contain an infinite message. The book's history represents the suffering of the Jews throughout the ages, and its release provides hope for the survival of righteousness in the world. This Tanya was originally a gift to the Lubavitcher Rebbe from his students; now it is a gift to humanity.

Seven more books were subsequently returned to President Clinton during his first visit to Russia. The Administration continues working for the return of the entire collection, and I know we'll receive ongoing bipartisan support. I'm confident that just as this Tanya is now housed in the Rebbe's room where it belongs, justice will find its place in the world.

By the way, one other part of this story has recently gained extra significance. As I mentioned, then-Senator Gore sponsored legislation calling on the Russians to return the books; that bill's original co-sponsor was Senator Joseph Lieberman.

Leon S. Fuerth is the National Security Advisor to Vice President Al Gore and sits on the Principals' Committee, the President's top foreign policy team.

Mr. Fuerth, who was a State Department foreign service officer before going to work on Capitol Hill, is Gore's longest serving staff member.

In the beginning, G-d created nothing

by Tzvi Freeman

There is a saying that we do not know who discovered water, but it was certainly not the fish. If so, it is difficult to imagine how humankind discovered existence—or conceived the absence of it.

If to perceive the water you must be able to know it from the outside, what is needed to comprehend existence itself? How can any of us be beyond Existence?

Yet a story of the Beginning is just that: a statement that there is existence and we are swimming in it.

Most peoples have myths about how our world began, how the Earth and its creatures were formed in some mythological past from some greater, celestial world. From a big thing came a smaller one—that fits nicely into what we know and how we think. We end up with a universe continuing endlessly in time and space. The finite extending infinitely, continually rebuilding itself on its own power. Absurd, perhaps, but entirely built of knowables. Being human, we are generally more comfortable with the absurd than with the unknowable.

But to imagine a creation of heaven and earth out of the void—that would seem beyond the human mind. For how could we imagine that which we do not know? How can we imagine the absence of the very substance of our imagination —an absence of the verb "to be?"

That is why, when the ancient Greeks translated the Bible, they wrote, "G-d, in the beginning, made heaven and earth." They didn't have a word for creation ex-nihilo, as the Hebrews did, because for them such a concept simply did not exist.

Yet, there is a place within the human soul that resonates with the nothingness, that knows existence from Beyond. It is not mind, not heart, nothing tangible or describable, just a certain sense of intimacy with the Infinite.

The unknowable within us connects with the Unknowable of the cosmos, and from there we know all things.

Knowing Genesis means to know the world from Beyond.

As Moses told his people, "Know as clear as day and meditate upon this: In the heavens and beyond, in the earth and below, the Unknowable is G-d. There is nothing else."

PERPETUAL CREATION

Like every story of the Torah, the story of Creation is a perpetual event. So too with every article of G-d's creation, spiritual and physical, large and small, from that glorious fusion reactor in the sky to this magazine in your hands.

From the tactile sense of paper beneath your fingers to the very thoughts going through your mind right now...each creation is pulled back out of the void over and over.

And if, for the smallest instant, that dynamic should cease, there would be not remain even a trace of what was. Nothing. Just as there was nothing before it all began.

We are not objects—we are events. And not very firm ones, at that.

COMPRESSING THE INFINITE

We need to know this, because without it we can't begin to understand a thing of Genesis. At every turn, Genesis is fitting an Infinite G-d into the space of a finite world. It tells us that the Infinite is concerned about what occurs in finite space. That He communicates with flesh and blood mortals. For the sake of public relations with humans in this finite space, He suspends the very laws He Himself set as parameters. He makes Himself into a "He"—a character within His own story, a character to which even the youngest child can relate.

If the earth were a place that G-d had to fit into, the whole story would be truly outrageous. If G-d had formed all this from some primordial substance that was "just there," independent of His will for it to be—with time already running, space there for the grabbing, and Newton's Laws of Motion presumed—then we could seriously question every story of Genesis.

But all our difficulties are based on a blinded view of what Creation is really about. We recreate our Creator in our own image and expect Him to build a world just as we do any of our inventions. When we form pottery, we start with clay. When we come up with a new technology, it is based on patterns already found in nature. And so our little toys can go on their merry way independent of us—since their basic substance existed before us and was never dependent on us to begin with.

His masterpiece, however, is painted on a canvas of nothingness. He is the artist, the materials, and the inspiration all as one. If He removes his brush for a moment, the painting vanishes. He is here within His handiwork, because it is made of His breath, His thought, and His speech. He is found within each event, each object, each emotion—in the heart of every animal and human, in every thought that passes through our mind. He can be found wherever He wishes to be found, because wherever He goes, there is only Him.

Abandon the notion that there is a world and there is a G-d. It is as foolish as thinking there is a story and there is a storyteller. When all is said and done, the world and G-d are one. There is only the storyteller, expressing himself in the story he tells. There is only the Unknowable, expressing Himself as a world.

DisOrganized ReLiGioN

From Paris With Love

Time for a quick game of word association. Don't think, just give an instant one word response to the following terms:

Aristocratic. Sophisticated. Elegant.

You probably didn't respond Kosher to any of them, right? Well, in that case you haven't been to Ishtar, a gem of a restaurant in Paris' exclusive 16th arrondisement. Every mouthwatering offering on the menu, from Cote de boeuf a la crème de myrtilles to Palets de chocolat croquant aux myrtilles, is 100% Glatt Kosher (certified by Gastronmique Francaise Glatt) and begs to enjoyed with a glass of fine Kosher wine.

Don't fret if you're not planning to be in France any time soon. There are superb Kosher restaurants in virtually every city, where the dining experience is every bit as elegant—and the menu a lot easier to read.

Look around. You'll be surprised by what you find in your area, or you can go to www.chabad.com or www.ok.org, just a few of many websites that list a huge variety of restaurants and kosher food purveyors worldwide.

You can always put on some jazz, light a few candles and cook up a little Kosher Gateau d'asperges au safran Coulis de tomate a l'ail on your own.

Is keeping Kosher "rational?" Not really. Kosher food is not necessarily healthier; the nutritional value of food depends on its content, not its ritual purity—which is what the laws of Kashrut really determine. The Torah does not specify any rational basis for the Kosher laws, other than the Divine wish. But there are many beautiful and spiritual Kabbalistic forces behind these laws.

Chassidisms

NESHAMA - The soul: an actual part of G-d within us that consists of spiritual and physical energy.

GALUTH - Exile: not necessarily as a place, rather as a purpose. Galuth is a means to fulfill our potential by perfecting the world and allowing spirituality to become the predominant force, resulting in its ultimate redemption.

NIGGUNIM - Chassidic melodies which mystically emanate directly from the soul, unconfined by lyrics.

KOSHER - Means "fit," and refers not only to food but also to ritual objects and places used for Jewish practices. It comes from the same root as Kashrut (the laws that govern the use of food and objects in Jewish life).

TREIF - Means "torn," and comes from an injunction that one may not eat any animal (whether it falls into permitted categories or not) if it has been injured (torn) by another animal. Treif is now commonly used to mean any forbidden food or activity or object.

CHASSIDIC REVOLUTION - The breaking down of barriers between factions within Judaism through the power of joy. Initiated by the Baal Shem Tov, the founder of Chassidism, it opened the teachings of Kabbala and inner dimensions of Judaism to ordinary people. The Lubavitcher Rebbe defined a chassid simply as "a Lamplighter."

Ask Moses.com

Wouldn't you like to have been there on Mount Sinai when Moses was asking G-d all those questions? (Okay we all were there, but how about in "real-time"). Well, guess what? You can still ask some tough questions and get straight answers, thanks to a new website called Ask Moses. Ask any question, any time, and get a real-live rabbi's real-time answer (except on Shabbat and holidays, of course). Ask Moses is coming soon, and you can get a sneak peek now by visiting www.askmoses.com.

Move Over Rose Bowl

Coming this Fall, old-time rivals UCLA and USC will suit up and meet on the gridiron for the first annual Chabad Bowl. (Well, not exactly...)

It's like this: since 1965, the UCLA Bruins have had a Chabad House—a physical and spiritual home for Shabbat dinners, classes, activities, counseling and other services, all led by super-dynamic Coach/Rabbi Mendel Cunin.

Now, at long last (after Rosh Hashanah to be exact), the Maroon and Gold will open the welcoming doors to its own Chabad House with Coach/Rabbi Dov Wagner at the helm.

With over 2,500 Chabad Houses worldwide, there's definitely one on a campus near you. For information on Chabad campus activities, contact your local Chabad, or call 1-800-CHABAD-9.

And remember, with Mendel at quarterback and Dov going long, this team can't lose. So drop by and practice!

the Apricots & the King

by Benyamina Soloveichik

In my village, a long time ago, we had a rabbi who, it seemed, had a knack for illumination. He was able to make the simplest problems glow with significance. And though I myself had never needed the rabbi's help, being a rather more complex person than the simple villagers, the rabbi and I had on many occasions found it enriching to spend an evening together talking of this and that.

In any case, it came to pass one year that I suffered a tremendous blow. I lost a great fortune through the foolishness of my wife—unintentional on her part to be sure—but an inutterable misfortune. I had not managed my family well. I see that now. And so, in great humiliation, I set off to see the rabbi, my only real friend in the village, to talk the thing over.

"Rabbi..." I began, but he bustled around with a bottle, two glasses, a plate of biscuits and a rush of words of his own. I fell quiet as he poured and arranged and proffered and poked the little fire in the grate and sighed and raised a glass.

"L'Chaim," he said, "What a story I have to tell you."

"But Rabbi..."

"In a minute, Ben-Ami, begging your pardon," he interrupted. (He always called me Ben-Ami, though it was not my name). "I had a dream, you see... Much too complicated for me, and I need your help in interpreting its meaning."

Well, what could it hurt, I thought. A dream. My problem could wait.

"Here it begins," he said: There was once a King in a great country who had no heirs. As he grew older, he began to think of such things as succession and dynasty, so he called upon his advisors. "I have seven Knights," he said, "who govern the seven counties in my Kingdom. And I have seven magical apricots hidden in a casket, presented to me by a wizard on the day of my birth. Gather my Knights for a banquet and we shall place one apricot in a silver dish at each place, and from this we will know who from among them to choose as the heir to my throne.

So the courtiers summoned the Knights, and the Knights summoned their attendants, and the attendants gave notice to the Ladies, and the Ladies gathered the servants, and the servants made ready the children and the clothes and the great carriagefuls of paraphernalia one takes to the Palace when summoned by the King. Six of the Knights and their households came thus, but the seventh, Cassiel, rode alone. He carried little with him, you see, having gone out for the day on affairs of his own, and when summoned, thought of nothing save to get to the King in great haste. And so was Cassiel, breathless and dusty, three days before the others, brought into the great hall where the King sat alone.

The King surveyed the Knight shrewdly. "Well, Cassiel," he said, "is this the attire in which one pays respect to his King?"

"It is Sire, if it is all one has when summoned."

"Humph," said the King, and then, "Have you brought no gift to show honor?"

"Only myself, Sire," said Cassiel steadily.

The King raised a brow. "And what makes you think, Sir Impudence, that such a self is a gift?"

"You yourself made me a Knight, Sire. I can only refer you to your reason for doing so. It is your judgment of value that I offer in offering myself."

The King was quiet a moment.

"Then give me that which I valued enough to make you a nobleman. Tell me, Casiel, who shall be my heir?"

Just then, Sir Cassiel looked at the long empty table and the beautiful luminous fruit. "With respect to your Majesty, are those the legendary apricots presented upon your birth?"

"Indeed they are," replied the King.

"What are their properties, Sire?" asked the Knight.

The King frowned at this breach of etiquette, but made no remonstrance. "They confer extraordinary health and wisdom," he replied.

"And are we each to have one?" Sir Cassiel questioned.

"Mayhap," replied the King. "But who shall rule my Kingdom?" he repeated, this time brooking no evasion.

"He who needs it not," replied the Knight, then bowed and took his leave.

When all the Knights were finally assembled, the King explained to the seven what he had explained to the one, and called for ideas. The Knights, each eyeing the golden orb before him, were loath to be the first to proffer a suggestion. But at last they poured forth like wine at a banquet: "Let each Knight give his fruit to the one chosen by all"; "No! Let each consume his own"; "Each should save his apricot for his own great crisis"; "Let us make a pottage and feed our firstborn sons." And so on.

"Well?" barked the King suddenly at Sir Cassiel, who had not spoken. "What say you, sir?"

"I claim them all, Sire," said he. "I will have the apricots to do with as I will."

A great roar of protest rose up from the table like a fire. Such boldness! Such greed! Audacity! Dishonour! Injustice! Insult! The words rose in a blaze to the ceiling and to the ears of the King.

"Silence!!" the King shouted. And then when all were subdued, "Done!" He said. "You may have them. Guards, gather them up."

Great was the consternation in the room when Cassiel strode away with the silver plates. He soon returned with only a cloth-covered plate and announced, "I have fed the apricots to our ladies."

"To the ladies?" the Knights all shrieked in dismay. "You wasted our apricots on the ladies?"

"No, sirs, I did not waste them. Where there is greater need, greater gifts should be given. Who bears your sons and daughters? Should they not have the health to bear and rear them and the wisdom to teach them well?

cloth from the apricot pits...

Is that not the greatest charge in the Kingdom?"

And here, Cassiel knelt before the King and held before him the covered plate.

"Here is your future orchard, Sire," continued Cassiel, removing the cloth from the plate on which the Knights all gasped to see nothing but seven apricot pits. "Where seven will become seven thousand and seven million, that each man, woman, and child in the Kingdom shall be nourished with health and wisdom, and your Land shall be the greatest on Earth, where every man will be the equal of his brothers, and every woman too."

And what Cassiel had said came to pass.

The rabbi sighed. "Can you help me make sense of it?"

"Well, but Rabbi," I said, a little taken aback. "Why did only Cassiel step forward? What does it all mean? That if we do not nurture our wives and children, we do not deserve... And why...?" Suddenly I poured out question after question in anguish, until I stopped red-faced and looked at my rabbi, to whom I had never addressed a question of any importance in all the years that we had known one another. He did not answer, but kindly bid me goodnight.

I was halfway down the street when I suddenly thought of something—and swiftly turned to my friend still standing in his doorway. "Rabbi! What was the name of the King?"

"Israel—" He addressed me by my true name for once, "Go home."

"Transition may be frightening. Status quo gives the illusion of safety."

COURAGE & Madness

by Adin (Steinsaltz) Even-Yisroel

We seem to feel the effects of transition, transformation, and change much more today than ever before. In the time of our fathers and grandfathers, apparent change would take decades, sometimes centuries; time seemed to move much more slowly. Now, it is as if we are living at an accelerated pace, and events that took place only two years ago seem like ancient history. Technology provides a partial explanation, but there is more to it than this external factor.

The changes entailed in growth and development are essential to the very definition of a meaningful life. Not only do we need such changes; our lives depend on them.

Nevertheless, transition may be frightening and fraught with danger. The status quo gives us the illusion of safety, of knowing. When there is movement and shifting about in our desires and emotions, our illusions and beliefs may break or collapse.

In any process of change there is an indeterminate moment between one stage and the next, an apparent void that has unlimited potential. This small segment of time is one of great risk, for within it anything can happen. These few seconds contain the difference between yes and no, between progress and retreat, between, at times, life and death. This moment of true human freedom is when choice becomes operative, when free will can become more than just a phrase.

Repentance is such a moment of transition—a moment precipitated by seeing something in a new light. It begins with thoughts and feelings, but words are its first external sign: the prayers of Rosh Hashana, Yom Kippur and the Ten Days of Repentance.

Spiritually we know the power of Divine Words, for it is through them that the world was created. The Torah tells us that it is through the amalgamation of specific sounds that the reality of earthly existence was accomplished. And that even though our words are only human, they, too, can effect true spiritual change.

These words are the opening to the void, to the nothingness that contains the possibility of anything; this is the point when we can transform ourselves, and in doing so, transform the world.

This moment of repentance is filled with uncertainty and awe, and so it should be. The Almighty created the world in order to be changed, and that it is no accident He has given us the ability, the desire, the courage and the madness required to step into the void—to leap into the great unknown and make those changes.

Although all of G-d's creatures are products of the Divine Utterance, only humans have the ability through word and deed to bring about the transformation and perfection the world requires. In so doing, we can participate, with G-d, in the continuous creation of the world.

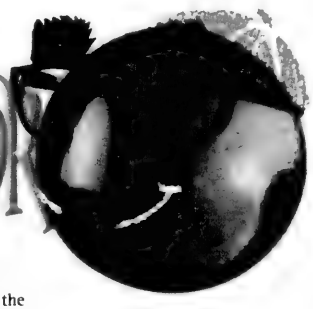
Farbrengen asked David Sacks, Executive Producer of "3rd Rock From The Sun" who has written for "The Simpsons," to describe what it takes to create humor. Funny things happen to David Sacks on the way to work every morning, but many of his hilarious jokes are inspired by serious issues.

THE HOLINESS OF HUMOR

by David Sacks



It is said that science describes the process through which something comes into being, but Torah describes why that thing exists. Put another way, Rebbe Nachman of Breslov says that science describes the outside of a phenomenon, whereas Torah describes the inside. What then does the Torah say about Laughter?

The Talmud (Shabbos 30b) records that the great Sage, Rabbah, always began his lectures with a humorous statement. This uplifted the students. According to the Baal Shem Tov, humor is that thing that ushers a person's mind from a place of constricted consciousness to a place of expanded consciousness.

A person in a place of expanded consciousness sees the totality of creation before him. He sees G-d's presence and goodness acting upon everything. And he realizes that anything and everything that happens is an expression of Hashem's love for us, whether we can understand it in the moment or not. Constricted consciousness is, of course, the opposite—the understandable impulse to take things too literally, believing that they are not a part of something greater. And so the greatness of humor is in its awesome ability to lift one out of depression into a place where the unseen—G-d's constant love and goodness—becomes palpable and real.

Humor and Laughter, while great in themselves, are actually subsets of a larger topic—Joy! One of the surprising things I learned when I started studying Torah was the central focus our religion puts on happiness. As Rebbe Nachman once put it, people are sad because nothing is going right for them—but what they don't realize is nothing is going right for them because they're sad! On the verse, "For you shall go out with joy" (Isaiah 55:12), the Kotzker Rebbe explains, "The beauty of joy is that it has the power to extricate man from all troubles." Joy means being in touch with the bigger picture, or as we said earlier, being in a state of expanded consciousness. The Hassidic Revolution that took place in Jewish thought properly restored Joy to the forefront of Jewish values.

This is actually very important to understand. So many of us think that Torah is essentially an intellectual discipline, but there is a vital emotional component as well.

If humor is the vehicle that transports us from a place of constricted consciousness to a place of expanded consciousness, then laughter is our reaction to that dizzying process.

From a comedy perspective, the surest way to get a laugh is by juxtaposing the expected with the unexpected. Thus, when we're convinced that the world is one way and the opposite happens—something that puts us in touch with how great and marvelous the world really is—the result is laughter.

With this in mind, one of the perplexing things in the Torah is the fact that our holy father Yitzhak, who represents the spiritual attribute of gevurah or strength, is Hebrew for the word "laughter." You might ask what does gevurah/strength have to do with laughter since they seem like total opposites. The reconciliation of these polar opposites is very deep. Sarah was a motherless woman of ninety. What is the last thing such a woman would expect to have? A baby! And what is it that our holy mother Sarah has? A baby! Laughter itself! Thus, Yitzchak becomes the embodiment of the unexpected. That's the explanation from the comedy standpoint. On a deeper level, Yitzchak comes to represent the ultimate strength it takes to not let go of our dreams. As such, he becomes the spiritual repository of Avraham and Sarah's most intractable desires. And this is gevurah or strength itself.

Psalm 126 says that in the Messianic era, "our mouths will be filled with laughter." Why? Because laughter in its highest and holiest expression is our reaction to the realization that the world is so much bigger, deeper and more beautiful than we ever gave it credit for. When we realize this, our only response will be to laugh.

The laughter Yitzchak represents is the happy ending that awaits us all—the Messianic Era which Hashem in His goodness has promised us. The Kabbalists say that when this day comes, let it be soon, G-d will grant us the eyes to see that we never left the Garden of Eden at all.

Until then, the question is how much do we believe in G-d's goodness? If we know He's good, then we can never give up hoping that a change for the better is just around the corner no matter how grim the circumstances. In Psalm 121 it says, "I raise my eyes to the mountains. From where (m'ayin) will my help come?"

Fascinatingly, the Vilna Gaon understands the word m'ayin to mean "from nothing." The line now reads, "I raise my eyes to the mountains—from nothing will my help come!" In other words, G-d's salvation can arrive from anywhere in an instant.

Once we understand this secret, we're in on the ultimate joke. That it's all good and it always was.

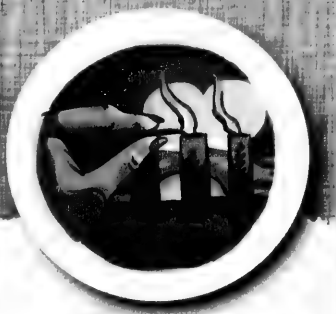
How to Tishrei

SOME IMPORTANT WHAT, WHEN AND WHY'S...

The tapestry of Jewish life—Solemn Days, Fast Days and Days of Rejoicing—is woven through the month of Tishrei. When we genuinely seek to attain the spirit of Tishrei, the essence of Torah remains within us for the entire year. To help you experience Tishrei to the fullest, here are some key rituals and customs along with the perspectives they are based on.



ROSH HASHANAH EVE

Friday, Sept. 29—Each Jewish festival and holy day begins with women of all ages illuminating our lives by lighting candles. When spiritual yearning is combined with simple wax and wick, amazing things happen. On Shabbat, they bring peace; on Rosh Hashanah, majesty; on Yom Kippur the flame is solemn; on Sukkot and Simchat Torah, it bursts with joy.

Light candles before sunset (see chart, p. 14).

Though this Day of Reflection is most profound, we relish a joyous holiday meal after the evening synagogue services to express our faith in G-d's ultimate mercy.

As with every Shabbat and holiday meal, recite Kiddush over wine or grape juice after the candles are lit. Though G-d has revealed the times when holidays are to take place, it is up to us to sanctify them.

After Kiddush, wash hands and recite the Hamotzi blessing over two Challa breads. The Challot represent the double portion of manna the Jewish people received in the desert in honor of Shabbat.

Throughout Tishrei, use round Challot to symbolize the cyclical nature of life.

To demonstrate our yearning for G-d to add sweetness to His judgment of our deeds, we dip a piece of Challa—then a piece of apple—in honey. Many people eat a pomegranate with the wish that their own good deeds will be as plentiful as the seeds of the fruit.

It is customary to greet each other with the blessing, Leshanah Tova Tikasev Vesechasem (May you be inscribed and sealed for a good year).

FIRST DAY OF ROSH HASHANAH

Saturday, Sept. 30—When Rosh Hashana and Shabbat coincide, as they do this year, the shofar is not sounded during Shabbat services. In spiritual terms, this is because the sanctity of Shabbat is equal to that of the shofar.

The Machzor prayer book used during services can be read in any language (G-d understands them all).

Light candles after nightfall (see chart, p. 14).

At the evening meal—after Kiddush and before Challa—enjoy a fruit not yet eaten this season to savor the taste of new beginnings.

SECOND DAY OF ROSH HASHANAH

Sunday, Oct. 1—The shofar is sounded during services to evoke a sense of coronation as we wholeheartedly declare anew that G-d is our King and we are His people.

Following the afternoon meal, go to a body of water containing live fish to perform Tashlich Services, which symbolically "cast our sins into the depths of the sea." The Machzor tells us: "Water symbolizes [G-d's] kindness, and fish an ever open eye [G-d's constant watchfulness]."

THE FAST OF GEDALIA

Monday, Oct. 2—This fast remembers the assassination of Gedalia, the last Jewish governor of Israel. His death led to the cessation of that period of Jewish rule with the destruction of the Second Temple.

THE TEN DAYS OF RETURN

Sept. 30 through Oct. 9—The Machzor declares, "On Rosh Hashana the decree is written, on Yom Kippur it is sealed."

The days from the onset of Rosh Hashanah to the conclusion of Yom Kippur are devoted to assessing the nature of your relationship with G-d and with humankind.

As it says in Psalms, "Seek G-d while He may be found." Each of the seven days between Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur has the spiritual capacity to transform all of the corresponding weekdays from the previous year.

SHABBAT SHUVA

Friday, Oct. 6—Light Shabbat candles before sunset (see chart, p. 14).

Shabbat is the spiritual pinnacle of the week. The first Shabbat of the year, Shabbat Shuva, possesses an exceptional capacity to transform who we are and what we will become.

YOM KIPPUR EVE

Sunday, Oct. 8—The ancient custom of Kaparot (atonement) is observed by circling a fowl (or money) later to be donated to charity, over one's head while reciting prayers. This act symbolically atones for our transgressions. As King Solomon teaches, "Charity protects from death."

It is customary to ask a friend for a piece of Lekach, honey cake. We pray this absolves us of the need to ask for help during the year.

The Talmud says, "Eating prior to the fast is equal to the fast itself." In this spirit enjoy two festive meals, the second one just before the fast begins (see chart). Parents traditionally use this special time to bless their children.

Light candles before sunset. In addition, light a Yizkor Lamp in memory of each departed loved one (see chart).

Yom Kippur begins at sundown with the Kol Nidre Service. To fulfill the Biblical injunction regarding Yom Kippur—"You shall impose affliction upon yourselves"—it is prohibited to eat, drink, wash, use perfume or lotion, have marital relations, or wear leather shoes during this time.

YOM KIPPUR

Monday, Oct. 9—Since white is spiritually associated with angels, it is customary to wear white as a symbol of purity and of rejecting mundane pursuits to connect with our essence.

During services on this holiest day, we recite the Yizkor service to honor departed loved ones.

The concluding prayer of the day, Neilah, culminates with the final sounding of the shofar. On Yom Kippur, the Gates of Heaven are open to all and Neilah marks their closing. Although these gates may now be closed, the Gate of Repentance remains eternally open.

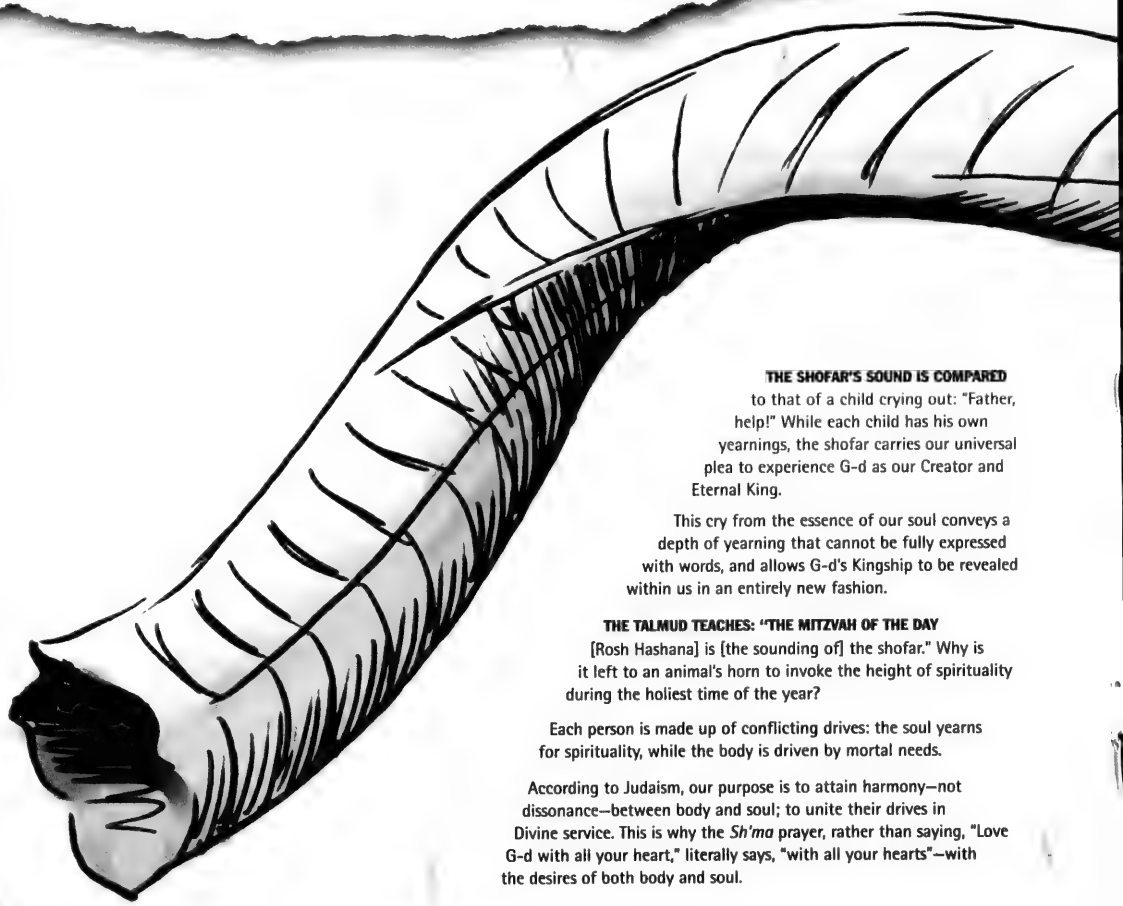
The Shofar

THE HEBREW WORD SHOFAR MEANS HORN. IT ALSO RELATES TO THE WORD "SHIPUR," IMPROVEMENT— a reminder of our soulful desire for spiritual growth. One thousand, one hundred and eleven separate shofar notes will be sounded during the High Holy Day season this year. Three hundred and ninety will be sounded on Rosh Hashanah, another seven hundred and twenty during the month of Elul, and one at the end of the Yom Kippur service.



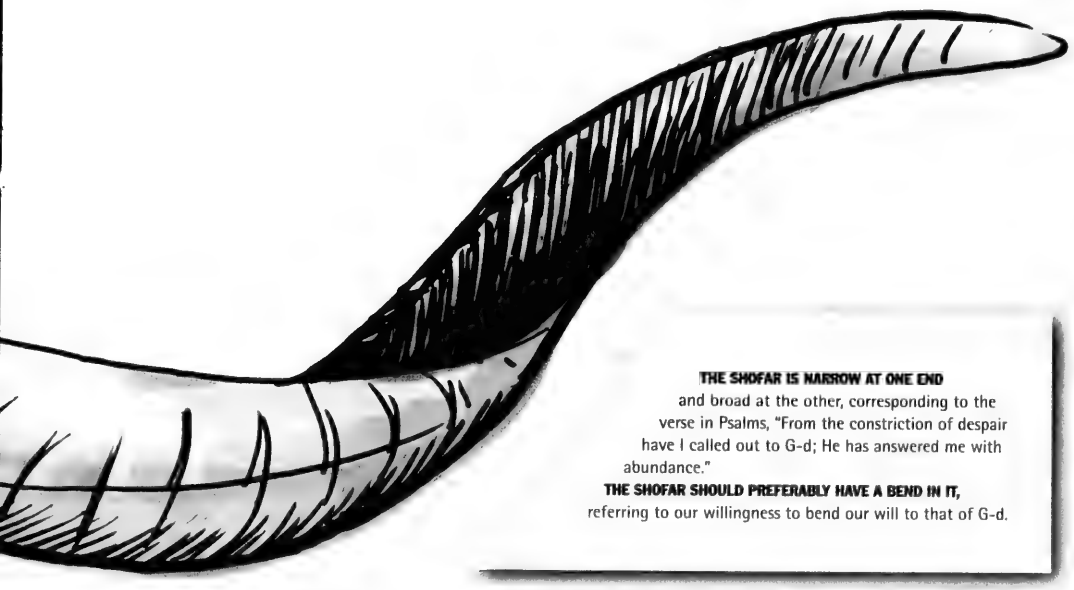
THE SHOFAR'S SOUND IS COMPARED to that of a child crying out: "Father, help!" While each child has his own yearnings, the shofar carries our universal plea to experience G-d as our Creator and Eternal King.

This cry from the essence of our soul conveys a depth of yearning that cannot be fully expressed with words, and allows G-d's Kingship to be revealed within us in an entirely new fashion.

THE TALMUD TEACHES: "THE MITZVAH OF THE DAY [Rosh Hashana] is [the sounding of] the shofar." Why is it left to an animal's horn to invoke the height of spirituality during the holiest time of the year?

Each person is made up of conflicting drives: the soul yearns for spirituality, while the body is driven by mortal needs.

According to Judaism, our purpose is to attain harmony—not dissonance—between body and soul; to unite their drives in Divine service. This is why the Sh'ma prayer, rather than saying, "Love G-d with all your heart," literally says, "with all your hearts"—with the desires of both body and soul.



THE SHOFAR IS NARROW AT ONE END and broad at the other, corresponding to the verse in Psalms, "From the constriction of despair have I called out to G-d; He has answered me with abundance."

THE SHOFAR SHOULD PREFERABLY HAVE A BEND IN IT, referring to our willingness to bend our will to that of G-d.

THE USE OF AN ANIMAL'S HORN ON ROSH HASHANA reminds us that even the most hardened "animal-like" instincts within mankind—those comparable to the hardest portion of the animal, its horn—are included in service to G-d, making His sovereignty all-encompassing.

ALTHOUGH MANY RITUAL VESSELS CAN BECOME "TAMEH" (ritually impure), the shofar cannot. The spiritual reason is that the shofar is the device with which we express our innate connection with G-d. This connection can neither be severed nor sullied. It remains intact regardless of how a person acts, and is always ready to be drawn upon.

Yet the nature of this connection is so pure and unblemished that if its conduit, the shofar, has even the slightest hole or crack, it is considered unfit for use.

THE SHOFAR IS A SPIRITUAL SIREN. Its message: "Awaken from your slumber and return."

However, a siren's call is of no help if it is not heeded. It is the human response that accomplishes the goal. So too, it is our response to the sound of the shofar that fulfills its spiritual purpose.

The shofar occupies a central role in three defining moments of Jewish history:

UPON ABRAHAM'S WILLINGNESS TO SACRIFICE his son Isaac, a ram caught by its horns in the bushes was revealed, and Abraham was commanded to use it in Isaac's stead. In return, G-d promised His eternal, unconditional love for Abraham's descendants.

WHEN THE JEWISH PEOPLE BECAME A NATION at the foot of Mount Sinai, the entire world heard the sound of the shofar as G-d revealed Himself.

WHEN THE WORLD ULTIMATELY REACHES PERFECTION with the coming of the Messianic Redemption, it will be heralded by the sound of the shofar.

Thus, when the shofar sounds we experience unconditional love for G-d, connect with the Divine revelation at Sinai, and prepare for the coming Redemption.

THE MITZVAH OF SOUNDING THE SHOFAR IS ONLY FULFILLED when the horn is blown with the intent of connecting to G-dliness. Otherwise, its notes carry no meaning beyond simple entertainment.

This concept – intent to connect with G-d – relates to the majority of Mitzvot. The word Mitzvah is derived from the Aramaic word Tzavsa, which means connection. The Mitzvot are not simply tasks to be blindly carried out. They are the spiritual tools He granted us to connect with Him in a meaningful way.

PREPARATIONS FOR SUKKOT

Oct. 10 through Oct. 13—The days leading to Sukkot allow us to transform the spiritual growth achieved during the "Days of Awe" into the joy we express during the holidays that follow.

This time is used to build a Sukka (see below), and procure the "Four Kinds": etrog (citron), lulav (date palm branch), haddasim (myrtle branches) and aravot (willow branches). Each "Kind" represents a different type of person—from the etrog, whose aroma and taste represents the righteous, to the aravot, with no smell or taste. Blessing them together symbolizes our unity.

SUKKOT EVE

Friday, Oct. 13—Light candles (see chart).

Beginning tonight and for the remainder of Sukkot, eat all meals in the Sukka—an outdoor shelter reminiscent of the huts the Jewish people used in the desert during the Exodus and the "Clouds of Glory" that accompanied them. Being in the Sukka reminds us of G-d's kindness, both then and now.

During Sukkot we gather with family and friends in the Sukka to celebrate this "time of our joy" with music, dance and Torah study.

FIRST DAY OF SUKKOT

Saturday, Oct. 14—The first day of Sukkot corresponds with Shabbat, thus today we do not bless the "Four Kinds." The Midrash says, "The purpose of the mitzvah is to infuse spirituality into the mundane," and the spiritual essence of Shabbat fulfills that purpose on its own. Light candles after nightfall (see chart).

SECOND DAY OF SUKKOT

Sunday, Oct. 15—Bless the "Four Kinds" in the Sukka. During Sukkot, we experience two dynamics of unity—the bringing together of the "Four Kinds," and joining together with family and friends in the Sukka.

Nightfall marks the beginning of the Intermediate Days of Sukkot.

CHOL HAMOED – THE INTERMEDIATE DAYS

Oct. 16 through Oct. 19—Each day of the rest of the week, bless the "Four Kinds"—preferably in the Sukka. Work is generally permitted during these joyous days.

HOSHANA RABOH

Friday, Oct. 20—On this day G-d confers His verdict upon us; thus it is a day of intense prayer.

Light candles before sunset (see chart), in preparation for the concluding holidays of Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

The first Hakafot (dances with the Torah scrolls in the synagogue) are held after the evening service to celebrate the upcoming completion of the yearly Torah reading.

SHEMINI ATZERET

Saturday, Oct. 21—Yizkor Memorial Services are recited today.

The next days are filled with merriment by people of all ages. Our physical celebration enables the holy Torah to dance in the world of action—expressing its joy in the physical realm.

Light candles after nightfall (see chart).

Beginning with the evening meal, we no longer eat in the Sukka.

SIMCHAT TORAH

Sunday, Oct. 22—The final chapter of the Torah is read in the morning. Everyone present is called to the Torah, with special attention paid to children. We then begin reading it anew as the dancing and rejoicing continues. As the Chassidic proverb says: "Dancing on Simchat Torah is equal to fasting on Yom Kippur." Simchat Torah ends at nightfall.

In Terms of Tishrei

Rosh HaShana (Heb.) (root: rosh – head, ha shana – cycle) n. head of year, birthday of mankind. Celebrated by renewing vows of servitude to G-d, crowning Him as King; the unique mitzvah is sounding the shofar.

Yom Kippur (Heb.) (root: yom – day, Kippur – atonement) n. day of atonement; holiest day of the Jewish year. Celebrated by abstention from physical pursuits, repentance and return to the core aspects of connecting to G-d on deeper level; this day provides the capacity to turn a fresh page.

Sukkot (Heb.) (root; sukkot – huts) n. huts. To celebrate G-d's kindness to His people during the Exodus, during this holiday all meals are eaten in a Sukka, a hut covered with palm or other branches. The holiday is also marked by blessing "Four Kinds" and by joyous expression of love for G-d to internalize the spirituality of "Days of Awe." Also known as "Celebration of the Harvest" and "Time of Rejoicing."

Simchat Torah (Heb.) (root: simcha – joy, Torah – source of Divine wisdom) n. The Joy of the Torah. On a macro-level celebrates our connection with Torah; on a micro-level celebrates completion of yearly Torah reading cycle and start of new sequence.

Dear Rebbe

I have a story to tell you

The following letter was sent to the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

Exactly ten years ago, I met my soulmate. Without going into great detail about our backgrounds, I will simply tell you that I was raised Protestant and later joined Catholicism, and my partner in life was raised agnostic but was born Jewish. Each of us had undergone great trials in our lives and had each sought G-d in our own way. For two years, we lived together in relative happiness, but after a while we realized that we had to find a religious community that would accept us and in which we could find spiritual fulfillment.

Our search took us to many places of worship in many different communities and cities. I couldn't renounce Christianity, and Susan could not embrace it. Neither of us were happy. The journey was arduous and painful; we quarreled and we cried.

Finally, Susan insisted that she loved me enough and that she was willing to embrace Christianity and make it her own.

That first Christmas, there was no celebration of Chanukah. No gifts, no lights and no cards even to her family. The second Christmas was no different.

The third Christmas was. On Thanksgiving day, we were walking on 65th Street. We found ourselves in front of Lincoln Square Synagogue, and suddenly Susan wanted to go inside. For no reason at all, she insisted we go inside. It was a fateful step for her, for us. We walked into a small hall where there was a lecture in progress. I remember vividly a woman named Blu Greenberg who spoke about traditional values, and then another woman, Bronya Shaffer, who spoke about the quest for a holy life in a material world. She was a follower of yours, and she changed the course of our lives.

Susan and I spoke with Mrs. Shaffer for a long time, mostly asking questions about the spiritual avenues open for Jewish women. I had never met as compassionate and caring a person as Mrs. Shaffer, and in a very short time we were openly telling her about our love and our plans for the future, including someday getting married in a church. Mrs. Shaffer acknowledged my religion with respect, and even acknowledged Sue's desire to convert, but insisted on one thing. She told Susan that if she were seriously contemplating such a drastic change in her life, it would have to be done in honesty, as a Jew.

Light a candle for Shabbat, she told Susan. Do it just once. It's what Jewish women do. And then do it again. And then keep doing it until it's comfortable and you know that it's a part of you. Then, you can think about changing yourself. Because, right now, you're not even comfortable with the "you" that you know. It's from a darkness that you are making a change. But life's changes should always take place in the light of day, not in darkness, because light is knowledge. So create your light, then think about your changes in that light.

The conversation continued. She emphasized that no matter what we did before or after, no matter our partnership, no matter our attendance at my prayer group, Susan—not I, she stressed – should continue to light a Shabbat candle every Friday evening.

And Sue did that. And then one day, Mrs. Shaffer called us and told Susan that she had a gift for us. She brought a mezuzah for our door. She said every Jewish person must have one and that it didn't matter that Susan was living with a non-Jewish person.

Susan continued lighting her Shabbat candle every Friday. Without fail, ever. Slowly, we realized that Susan would never renounce her religion, and we never talked about it much. With her lighting her candle, I could no longer bring myself to hurt her over our religious differences.

That's not the end of the story. My Susan died on her birthday, the second day of the Festival of Lights, three years ago. Her family had long forsaken her, and it was left to me to see to her final resting place. A Christian burial was the obvious thing, but at the last minute, I noticed the silver case on our doorpost and, in my mind, I could see her candle burning and realized that I had to turn to a rabbi to see to her burial. The chaplain at the hospital saw to the details. I did not attend. I mourned her privately at home and in my church, and I mourn her still.

The crystal candlestick stands by my bed, forever lit. The little rolled-up scroll that hung on our living room door was buried with her. And the silver case, I am sending to you.

May her soul rest in peace. My Susan, spurned by her family and friends, found some comfort in your teachings. She was born a Jew. She finally lived as a Jew. And she was buried as a Jew.

May G-d bless her. May G-d bless you, honorable Rebbe, may G-d bless your people, and may G-d bless Bronya Shaffer.

Journeys to the

A Conversation with Andy Statman
by David Sears

Andy Statman, a virtuoso clarinetist and mandolinist, is one of the greatest living exponents of Jewish instrumental music. The protégé of the legendary Klezmer clarinetist Dave Tarras, Andy appears on more than one hundred recordings—including his most recent CDs, The Hidden Light (Sony Classical) and Between Heaven and Earth (Shanachie). This interview with his friend and colleague David Sears marks the first time Andy has committed his thoughts on this quintessentially Jewish art form to print.

Q. Having performed in so many different musical styles, what drew you to traditional Jewish music?

A. I've been privileged to work with master musicians from many traditions. However, this is my tradition. So it speaks most strongly to me.

Q. And what does it say?

A. In traditional Jewish music, the melodies (called niggunim) are specifically set up as "journeys to the Infinite." They are composed to induce a spiritual transformation in both the player and the listener. The deveykus niggunim—the slow, meditative melodies sung by Chassidim—are extremely powerful. Each section contains its own experience, so you don't have to build up to a certain high point. You feel the pulse immediately.

Q. So these spiritual experiences are sort "hard-wired" into the melodies?

A. Right. The melodies are written to express specific feelings, which become keys to unlock doors of what the Chassidim call shefa, which roughly translated means G-dly benevolence. If you play them with the right intention-if you let the feelings "possess" you so that playing them comes from the same part of your psyche as speaking-then you can unlock those doors. This can happen even if you're not the greatest musician. It can happen to a child.

Q. How can one learn to play traditional Jewish music in an authentic manner?

A. First of all, you must study the recordings made by the immigrant Klezmer musicians during the early 1900s. All of these players were born into the traditional Jewish world of Eastern Europe. In fact, many of them came from Chassidic homes. So they vividly understood the purpose music serves in Jewish religious life. The truth is, I can't imagine how I could have continued to progress as a Jewish instrumentalist without having immersed myself in Judaism. Because the music is inseparable from its context.

Learning to play a particular style is like learning to speak a language. And the only way to really understand a living language is to become part of an environment where that language is spoken. Then you can see the different ways the language is used to express various thoughts and feelings—how even a physical gesture can communicate something in that language. By your becoming part of that environment, its language becomes a living part of you. For a musician to really understand and experience what's being expressed in traditional Jewish music, he needs to live the life of a Jew. Only then is it possible to tap the wellsprings of this music and understand its message.

Q. What message?

A. Its real message is beyond words. But when these melodies are played in the proper musical setting and with the proper intent, that message becomes readily apparent. Having said this, I must add that the root of Jewish music is emunah-faith in G-d. The Baal Shem Tov (founder of the Chassidic path) taught that faith itself is deveykus (the soul's experience of cleaving to G-d). And Rebbe Nachman of Breslov said that deveykus is attained primarily through music. So faith is the root of Jewish music. It's not a form of entertainment. It's meant to be a spiritual workshop for the soul.

Q. What's the connection between Chassidic music and Klezmer music?

A. Chassidic vocal music is the only Ashkenazic (Eastern European) musical tradition still alive today. And it's really alive. Although the two forms are closely related, Chassidic vocal music has a broader palette, both stylistically and emotionally, than Klezmer. For the most part, Klezmer was an instrumental interpretation of Chassidic vocal music.

The Klezmer repertoire mainly consisted of actual Chassidic niggunim; melodies written as showcases for the virtuosity of the instrumentalists, but which nevertheless evoked the feelings of the religious vocal music; and a shared local repertoire of regional music, either stylistically transformed to elicit the feelings of the Chassidic melodies, or simply performed in their original non-Jewish style. Although regularly played by Jewish instrumentalists, the latter cannot properly be called Jewish music any more than the light classical pieces these musicians also played. My teacher, Dave Tarras, recorded Cossack and Ukrainian melodies, but this material was never considered to be anything other than what it was.

Many of the popular Klezmer dance tunes are really Chassidic rikkudim, and not even in disguise. Traditionally, they serve the same purpose: to fulfill the mitzvah (commandment) of gladdening the Choson and Kallah (groom and bride), and to bring the soul closer to G-d through joy. The concept of "Jewish party music" is alien to traditional Jewish life. People who understand these dance tunes as such simply lack the proper frame of reference. The slower Klezmer melodies are either instrumental versions of deveykus niggunim, or introspective compositions that convey a sense of G-d's majesty and mystery. As the Klezmer tradition fell into decline, these introspective pieces became more technically complex and musically clever. They became top-heavy and lost their depth and meaning.

Q. If you feel that Klezmer is no longer a living tradition, what sort of "Jewish instrumental music" are you playing today?

A. The repertoire includes the niggunim we sing in shul (synagogue), some Klezmer tunes, and my own compositions. While grounded in the Klezmer tradition, my own stylistic approach is very American and even eclectic-because that's what I am. Some melodies are played in a straightforward manner, others are vehicles for improvisation. Sometimes we go on musical excursions, playing only three or four songs in a two hour set. To allow this to happen, I try to keep things open with the other musicians-we can create a spontaneous musical dialogue born of the moment, but guided by the melody we are playing. What makes this "Jewish?" The core material. And one's own spiritual intent.

David Sears is the author of "The Path of the Baal Shem Tov" (Jason Aronson 1997), "Compassion for Humanity in the Jewish Tradition" (Jason Aronson 1998), and "The Flame of the Heart: Chasidic Prayers" (Breslov Research Institute 1999).

"But you said yourself there probably wasn't time for life to form from primordial goo when the bombardment stopped from the heavens."

"True. The fossil record seems to indicate this. That's what led to the Panspermia theory, that life on Earth began elsewhere and was carried here on cosmic debris. Far-fetched, maybe, but it makes more sense than two people traveling in paradise for a few years."

We had stopped on the corner a few steps from my home. My rabbi, my friend, resumed quietly. "The Torah is the key to understanding the world. If you don't believe in the beginning, how can you believe in the end?"

"But science tells us the Earth is ancient," I insisted. "How can you accept that the Earth is only 5,761 years old?"

He smiled at me. "Isn't it remarkable that G-d created a 15 billion year-old world in six days?" I laughed and he continued. "What is time anyway—today, tomorrow, the past, the future? The brain is not the key to understanding everything. The brain comes from dust, the soul from Above. Sometimes we have to also listen to our soul."

Knowing that we could continue all night—and were unlikely to resolve the issue—I brought the subject to a close. "I leave tomorrow. I don't know when I'll return."

"Where are you going and why?"

I decided to interpret his question literally. "Arizona and I don't know why. All I know is that they wanted me to report today."

"On Shabbat? But who knows? Maybe there are Jews in this secret place." Then silence—his expression mirrored mine in its sadness. "We will miss you," he whispered as he shook his head. He turned and walked slowly away, his prayer bag tucked under his arm.

The plane ride the next day was uneventful. I was whisked from the airport in Phoenix in a three-car motorcade then traveled for hours deep into the Western Arizona desert. My destination at first glance appeared to be a small cattle tracking station. Once inside, a short elevator ride revealed the real base—a sprawling underground installation (now digitally populated by white coats and uniforms). A uniformed man, a commanding presence, bearing a rank insignia and name tag, met me at the bottom steps of the elevator.

"Dr. Wiseman, I presume?" He then proceeded to quote from my resume, "Ph.D from MIT in nuclear physics, 15 years with the Department of Defense, 10 years with the National Security Agency—you're a top-notch problem solver. Dr. Wiseman, we have a problem that needs solving."

He led me down a side corridor through a series of thick steel doors. I was prepared for nearly everything, but not for what lay beyond the last door. It was a ship—a smooth, glistening silver ship—the spaceship of every kid's dreams. "Yes, it's real," the general said, "discovered about 20 years ago by oil company engineers doing some routine test drilling. And for 20 years we have been trying to get inside. Torches, lasers, radiation, pressure. Super computers and super brains. We even threw a kitchen sink at it. Twenty years and not a scratch. Now it's your turn." And with that introduction, he walked away.

My turn. Taking a deep breath, I began to circle the ship, pausing at what appeared to be a large half-oval indent in one side. "A door?" I asked a nearby white coat. "Who knows?" she replied. She saw my eyes drawn to a narrow rectangular object fixed to the right side of the oval at an angle of about 70°, just above eye level. "We worked on that little object and its surface markings for 5 years," she said. "Could be a key, a camera...a doorbell. Five years."

Staring at the object, my brain began swirling with possibilities. Maybe the ratio of two sides of the rectangle is close to the eccentricity of the oval, or the angle of incline is connected to the cyclonic ratio between the object and the ship. My eyes remained frozen on the object. There was something so familiar...something.

Listening to my soul, I touched the object and kissed my fingers. The door opened.

WILL IT LAST?

by Yosef Y. Jacobson

If G-d is "perfect," as Judaism says, what prompted Him to create the universe? What void was He seeking to fill?

The answer provided in Jewish Mysticism is that G-d desired marriage. Marriage necessitates the existence of someone distinct from yourself with whom to share your life, a union of husband and wife. G-d chose humanity as His bride.

What a marriage this has been—a roller coaster of romance, affection, quarrels and estrangement. In every generation, many counselors advocated a divorce and some even proclaimed the groom dead. Yet the relationship has endured because both partners intrinsically know that they belong together. When all veils are removed, man manifestly yearns for union with G-d.

According to the Kabbala, the upcoming High Holiday season is the annual experience of the cosmic matrimony between G-d and humanity. The five key spiritual moments of the season parallel the basic phases of a conventional courtship and union. The holidays invite us to journey through this process again and rejuvenate the relationship.

The Hebrew month of Elul precedes the High Holidays. This month (which began on September 1 this year) is described in Chassidic teachings as a time when "the King goes out to the field to meet with His people, greeting them with kindness and tenderness, displaying a joyous face to all." We, in turn, "open our hearts to G-d."

This time provides us with an opportunity to get to know G-d.

Four weeks later, on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, He makes His proposal.

The world goes haywire, says Master Kabbalist Rabbi Issac Luriah. "During the night of Rosh Hashanah," he writes, "the consciousness animating the universe becomes frail and weak." The great Jewish mystics would, in fact, feel physically weak during the night of Rosh Hashanah.

All of existence was brought into being for the sake of this proposed marriage. If we refuse Him, then it was all in vain. The entire cosmos awaits our decision.

On the morning of Rosh Hashanah, a piercing sound rises from the Earth: the cry of the shofar. It is a simple cry, expressing man's yearning to connect with the Divine.

We have decided. Our answer is yes.

The wedding day arrives: Yom Kippur. A day described in the Kabbala as "the time of oneness" in which cosmic bride and groom forge a bond for eternity.

In the Jewish tradition, bride and groom fast on their wedding day. On the day we unite with G-d, we abstain from food or drink as well. The Talmud teaches that upon marriage, all the sins of the groom and bride are forgiven.

That's why this day is called Yom Kippur, "the day of atonement."

The marriage ceremony begins with the stirring melody of Kol Nidre, in which we remove the power from vows and addictions that tie us down. During these profound moments, we attempt to free ourselves from compulsive behavior and negative habits and let go of resentment, animosity, anger, fear and envy.

The traditional Jewish marriage ceremony culminates with the bride and groom entering a secluded room (Cheder Yichud in Hebrew) to spend time alone with each other. Yom Kippur culminates with the Neilah, or closure prayer, so called because as the sun of Yom Kippur sets, the gates of heaven close—with us inside.

During Neilah, every soul is alone with G-d.

When the bride and groom exit their private room, the party begins. From Yom Kippur we leap into the seven-day festival of Sukkot, described in the Torah as "the time of our Joy."

These days are filled with feasting and ecstatic happiness, celebrating the union between G-d and His people.

The wedding feast is over. The guests and relatives have returned home. In a consummation of the relationship, bride and groom experience intimacy for the first time, their lives melded together as a husband and wife.

Hence, following the seven days of Sukkot, we reach the zenith of the High Holiday season: Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, described in the Kabbalah as the "time of intimacy with the Divine." During these two charged days, the joy reaches its peak as G-d and His people merge into a seamless whole. A Divine seed is planted in each of our hearts.

That's why we recite special prayers for rain on the festival of Shemini Atzeret. What is rain? In the midst of intimacy between heaven and earth, procreative drops from heaven are absorbed, fertilized and nurtured by mother-earth, which in time will give birth to its botanical children.

The honeymoon comes to an end and the excitement begins to fade. Now the marriage becomes about caring for each other and demonstrating trust and loyalty as we work through the daily grind of life.

The only month in the Jewish calendar which lacks a festive day immediately follows the High Holiday season. The Hebrew month of Cheshvan is the time to build a genuine relationship with our marriage Partner in our everyday lives. This is the time to discover the joy born out of a continous relationship with G-d.

"...a roller coaster of romance, affection, quarrels and estrangement. Many counselors advocated a divorce and some even proclaimed the groom dead..."

WELCOME TO PLANET EARTH

by Rochel Yaffe

The infant draws its first breath and emits a weak cry. The umbilical cord is cut, severing the newborn from its mother, and a living, breathing, autonomous child enters the world. Every step of an embryo's development is shrouded in mystery and beset by paradox. Each stage is nothing less than miraculous-beginning with the tiny drop that holds every facet of a human being, continuing through the growth inside the womb, and culminating with the transformation at birth from an organ of its mother into a person with a life of its own.

All of us who have been blessed with children have experienced that moment of awe and wonder–when the pain of labor is forgotten with the overwhelming recognition that we have just witnessed a miracle.

"Had we not seen it (a child's birth) with our own eyes," writes Maimonides, "and someone had just told us about it, we would have denied it." (Moreh Nevuchim, Part II, Chap. 17)

According to the Kabbala, there is a parallel between the birth of a child and another great mystery. The child in the womb resembles the world in the state of Galuth (Exile). And the moment of birth is like that of deliverance.

The unborn child lies curled in the darkness of the womb, its head resting between its knees. It possesses all its organs, but does not have the use of its senses. The eyes cannot see; the ears cannot hear; the breath of life will not enter its lungs until the moment of birth. Thus the child remains powerless, unable to emerge into the light and fulfill its potential.

While some associate the warmth of the womb with comfort and security, the Kabbala views it as a place of confinement. The darkness of the womb symbolizes the spiritual darkness of our Exile when G-d's presence is concealed in the world and we, His creation, may seem separate from Him. In fact, the Hebrew term for the world, olam, comes from the same root as the word helem, or concealment.

Like the unborn child, the world is only half-alive in exile. Mankind has eyes but does not see the inherent spirituality in this world; we have ears but pay no heed to the voice of the soul; we have lungs but not the breath, the spirit of life, that gives vitality to the heart and mind. Our physical desires and love of material things obscure the light of the soul and the intellect.

This bleak picture is, of course, incomplete.

Let us return for a moment to the embryo. True, it is a limited creature and a long way from achieving its potential as a complete human being. But there is no other period in a person's life as crucial to future development as those months in the womb; the slightest variation in environment can do great harm or untold good.

Galuth then, like pregnancy, has a meaningful purpose. At a time when the world is in spiritual exile-beset by pain and suffering-even a single good deed shines forth with great brilliance, for light is infinitely more precious when it comes forth from darkness.

And just when the pain of labor becomes unbearable, the child is born. All obstacles melt away-and all suffering is transformed into joy.

KABBALA KOMIX

Jay is 13 and his parents have passed on to the True World. He spends his life creating virtual worlds and their inhabitants in cyberspace, searching for meaning within them.

Hi, your website said you provide support for advanced universe-creators. Is there a way to put real consciousness into my creations? Like, I want them to make their own decisions, maybe even rebel against me.

I think I can help. You need to use our creation simulation technology. We'll meet on the roof of our downtown office. Your father says it's time now.

My Father??

The next day they take off from the office launchpad.

Jay begins the task of arranging the lights. Without warning, the monitoring devices of the console sink to zero.

Let's just say I knew your father. He once gave me certain instructions regarding his son.

Oh - but - Wow! What kind of silicon do you use to manage this data?

...if this is infinite, how can finite beings exist in it?

Do we exist here?

I - I - I don't know!

That's a good start!

Jay, I'm not allowed to give you answers - you have to experience them yourself. This is what you'll do: Analyze the light you see into ten concentric, conceptual bodies. If you succeed, you will uncover the secret of creation. The exercise begins now.

The infinite light is gone!! We must have entered the Void!

Name that hydrogen. Each star is its own computer, and they are networked together for multiple processing. The user-interface is thought-activated. Now check our readings.

They indicate a body of infinite energy. Impossible! How can the infinite fit in a finite space? And...

No. The light is still here. As is its source. For the Ein Sof is found in darkness as in light. Only to your physical eyes has the light disappeared. In truth, it encompasses, surrounds and pervades all of space, and pervades things as well. There is no room for fear.

That is the realm of Wisdom, the first repository of infinite light. Your task is to preserve it, along with all the realms yet to come.

A blast of immeasurable force now runs down the beam and engulfs Wisdom.

Quick! Contain it!

It has been weakened by the withdrawal that came before it. Contain it!

But this energy is an aura of the infinite light! I can't contain the infinite!

I can't! Every time I try to think what to do, it begins to disappear!

Allow You have found the realm of Wisdom within yourself. Now find its secret.

Stillness?

Yes. Wisdom has its power in stillness. It must remain connected in perfect stillness to the Source of Light to receive the energy flowing from there.

A beam of light stretches forth from beyond the emptiness, first in a straight line, then forming a perfect sphere, that envelopes the entire realm.

There is another realm forming within Wisdom. The beam of infinite light is descending to fill it as well.

Can you save it? It is called Understanding.

Only by keeping it within the bonds of Wisdom. But...

Yes! You have the wisdom of your father, the Tzadik.

But now yet another realm has formed within these two. It is the realm of Realization.

Can it be preserved?

I don't see how. How can one realize the infinite light? Perhaps by using Wisdom and Understanding...

If this one is not saved, all others will be in danger. A world of evil could ensue.

It's not working! Realization can't handle it! I can save only the upper aspects!

BEHIND THE SCENES

With Tzvi Freeman and Ian Webster,
Creators of Kaballa Komix

Q: First off, can you describe Kaballa?

A: Generally speaking, it's the body of Torah knowledge that describes the essential character of things, as opposed to their outward manifestations. It's the underlying theology of Judaism.

Q: Is everything Jay learns here "factual?"

A: Very. The ancient tradition of the Creation that we refer to comes from the Zohar–the collection of books that comprise the Kaballa–and the Etz Chayim, written by Rabbi Chaim Vital in the 16th century.

Q: Creation is pretty heavy stuff. Can Jay really understand this?

A: Good question. It should be impossible for a created being to comprehend the process of his own creation. But since we were made "in the image of G-d," we're all in effect tiny models of the whole creation process. We're essentially showing Jay what happens when his mind invents an idea. From this, he'll see "the big picture," since Mankind's creative process mirrors the original Creation.

Q: Can you give an example?

A: There's a G-dlike place somewhere inside you that knows everything, but that knowledge can't be articulated. Sometimes you try to tap that source of all knowledge, and you get nowhere. That's when the void happens.

Q: What's the void?

A: Anyone who's tried to create something has experienced it. And just when it seems hopeless and impossible to create or innovate, a breakthrough comes. That's wisdom. It's just a flash, but it contains everything you need.

Q: How do you grasp that insight?

A: Once you enter the realm of "Binah"–"Understanding"–you're on very volatile ground. You could lose the entire thought in an instant. But Jay managed that one in this exercise.

Q: But he didn't manage Realization.

A: To be continued...

"What profit hath a man of all his labor that he takes under the sun?
One generation passes away,
And another generation comes.
But the earth abides forever...
All rivers run to the sea,
Yet the sea is never full."

A Painter of Signs

by Blair P. Grubb, M.D.

My father was, among other things, a painter of signs. My youth was spent amidst the smells of paint, the feel of different brushes, and the markings of ruler and square. Now, as I reach to pick up a brush, I stop and for a moment, my mind drifts back to childhood, to the day my father first taught me to paint.

"Before you begin," he would say, "frame the piece in your mind; picture its details. Then, mark the lines carefully. They will guide your hands."

"Hold the brush like this, turning the tip slightly upward," he would instruct as he held my hand with the brush in it, guiding its motion. "Bring the stroke down firmly but carefully; make each part flow."

Each letter had its own personality. Each had to be perfect, yet joined into the whole. The spacing had to be varied to give the word balance. No matter what the sign said, or where it went, it was a reflection of the painter. Slowly, I learned the art he had perfected, for among his peers he was considered a master.

My father was a lover of music. The sounds of Benny Goodman, Glenn Miller, and the other masters of swing would course through our house or car, and my father's pleasure at hearing them was almost palpable. So even now, when the sound of big bands or swing comes over the radio, a feeling of sadness arises within me without warning.

My father was a lover of leather. He admired that it kept out the cold winds, that it was tough yet smooth, and that it got better with age. Now as I wear the jacket that was once his favorite, the soft touch and gentle smell of it floods my mind with memories and a wave of emotions passes over me. Somehow, at these odd moments, I deeply feel his presence around and within me.

A father is always a father, even when he is too old to do what a father has done all his life, and even when he lives only in your memories. Perhaps his death has made his existence even more precious to everyone whose life he once touched. I think of that now as I gather the brushes and the paints and the ruler, these objects now becoming a cherished reminder of my love for him, even though my father is now gone.

Today is a special day...my daughter has asked me to help her with the lettering of her school project. She has asked me to teach her to paint a sign.

"Draw the lines straight," I say as my eyes begin to moisten. "They will be your guides."

"Hold the brush like this," I intone, my voice crackling slightly as I take her hand to guide her strokes. I show her how to make the top of the 's' smaller than the bottom, how to space the 'i' closer to keep the perspective right, curve the top of the 'o' slightly more than the bottom, and flair the leg of the 'r' outward to give it balance.

"Yes," I tell her as her hand moves gently across the surface, carefully making each letter, "bring the stroke down firmly."

I smile as I watch her, and feel a tear slowly making its way down my cheek.

"That is good, let the paint flow." All this I show her, for among other things, I am her father, and I too am a painter of signs...

RE: SOULFUL SEDER COMPANION

I haven't been to a seder since my grandmother died 12 years ago. At her Passover table she'd tell stories that brought everything we were doing to life. She'd explain things in a way that made us want to be a part of what was going on.

When I saw the Seder Companion inside Farbrengen, it made me think of her. You did a terrific job at explaining the background information and providing profound insights. It made me look forward to Passover like I used to.

But what struck me the most is that when I called Chabad to see if I could get a few more magazines to share with my friends, they sent 20 copies. That's pretty amazing considering they don't even know who I am.

Thanks for making Passover special again.

RE: LOVE IN A HEARTBEAT

The story by Dr. Blair Grubb about the young Haitian boy so willing to give his life so that his sister may live was exceptional. I am a registered nurse who spent three years working in the barrios of Santiago, Chile. While our circumstances were not as remote as those Dr. Grubb so beautifully described, we too encountered children with little else than the goodness of their hearts to call their own.

RE: WHO NEEDS ORGANIZED RELIGION?

Tamar Frankiel—and virtually everybody else who writes about the purpose of religion and the forces that drive it—declared in your Passover issue, "Who needs organized religion? G-d does. G-d is in need of man."

A grand statement. But what does it mean? Is Ms. Frankiel really suggesting that the all-powerful and all-knowing Creator of the universe needs mortal creations to bond together in houses of worship to sing His praises?

It is certainly uplifting for our own lives to seek G-d, whether in a temple, or a child's face, or a bird flying above. And it certainly adds depth to our existence to devote our lives to something beyond ourselves.

However, to assume that G-d needs religion in order to fulfill the purpose of the universe is to attribute human needs and qualities to the power that created humans, needs and qualities.

RE: 2012

Anne Simon's science fiction is truly prophetic. We are experiencing an explosion of technology that places undreamt-of power in human hands. As time goes on and new discoveries are made, it will become increasingly clear that science reflects the truths of G-d, just as the Wailing Wall in Jerusalem echoes the prayers of mankind.

If we strive to enhance our scientific search for truth by constantly expanding our spiritual search for the divine, we can transform the dream of an ideal future into a functional blueprint for society.

I've read Simon's book, "The Science Behind The X-Files," which was also excellent. But here we see science is ultimately the human study of G-d's mind, the search to understand the laws that G-d installed to run the physical universe.

RE: ONCE UPON A BLUE MOON

A lot of people say a lot of things about Laura Schlesinger. Apparently some love her and others are upset. For better or worse, my own taste is not talk radio so I'm not in a position to judge her one way or another.

But whatever she stands for or against, her article in Farbrengen obviously came straight from the heart of a person who wants to share a breakthrough moment of personal truth. That's universally touching.

Personal beliefs are of no consequence when it comes to the event she reported. To be honest, the purity of the aura surrounding the union of two souls made me envious on all sorts of levels.

RE: WILL TECHNOLOGY CHANGE SPIRITUAL

The Wheel. The Locomotive. Electricity. The Tele Ring a bell? Each one of these epic inventions declared to be "the greatest ever!" But upon rea each plateau, humanity trumped itself. Why no we suddenly, and may I say arrogantly, assume have come across the mother of all inventions, Internet? Furthermore, do we assume that spirit has a greater role in the Internet than it had in monumental human achievements? If yes, why

RE: FARBRENGEN

I'm not a big letter-writer, but I wanted to let yo know how interesting Farbrengen is to me as someone who's not Jewish – and not even especi religious. I was literally sitting in a coffee shop looking for something to read when I saw a copy your magazine lying on the next table. I picked it and was so intrigued I ended up staying there unt I'd read the whole thing from cover to cover. The writing is very accessible, and the concepts you address are really thought-provoking. Thanks for putting out a publication that deals with spiritual topics without preaching.

RE: IS G-D PRO-CHOICES?

I reference your article in the "Passover Edition" of Farbrengen titled "Is G-d Pro-Choices."

I respect Mr. Tauber's attempt to resolve a question posed for thousands of years by biblical scholars. Y while presenting many intriguing thoughts, unfortu nately, none of his assertions answer the question.

A great person once told me, "Never present a question in an essay you cannot answer." And Tauber did just that.

The matter of choice among human beings remains mystery. Personally, I respond to it by making choice believe will have a good effect overall. With that in mind, I can't say for sure if my actions are the result of "free choice" or simply the result of playing out t string of events that are my destiny.

Blessed where brothers meet

The man in the accompanying photo embodies the prayer, indeed the summons, that we chant in the synagogue before we hear the sounds of the shofar on Rosh Hashanah: "Let all nations join hands, bringing forth to God the sounds of the shofar with an utterly happy voice."

As we reflect on our lives and on our purposes this Rosh Hashanah, let us also do so with an utterly happy voice, but let us do so as well, mindful of the vast work that needs still to be done in this world if we are to understand the true purposes for which God has granted us life.

An ancient parable about Jerusalem may help us to understand those purposes:

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

State of Israel faces historic decisions: Moshe Katsav

Dear Friends,

On the eve of Rosh Hashanah it is a privilege and an honour for me to convey to you best wishes for a happy and blessed New Year, a year in which we hope to see the fulfilment of our historical dreams and national aspirations.

The State of Israel faces crucial and historic decisions, among the most important taken since its establishment. Our prayers and efforts are aimed at attaining a comprehensive, true and permanent peace with all the nations of the Middle East.

At the same time, Israel, the Jewish people and Judaism are confronted with many national challenges of supreme importance. Jewish education and assimilation must be put high on our agenda and paramount attention should be given to the encouragement of immigration to Israel. If the majority of the Jewish people lived among us, the peace process with the Arab nations would progress more quickly and effectively.

From Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, I call on the Jews in the Diaspora to come and join us in the building, strengthening and developing of our country for the benefit of our future generations.

L'shanah tovah um'vurechet ul'shanah haba'ah b'Yerushalayim hab'nuyah.

I reach out to the family of Jews: Ehud Barak

Dear Friends,

As we welcome the New Year, 5761, I reach out to the family of Jews around the world with a continued commitment to seek true and lasting peace for our people. Our common prayer is for a strong and secure Israel at peace that will provide the foundation for a safe and prosperous future for our children.

May the New Year strengthen the bonds of our peoplehood so that together we can assure the continuity of Jewish heritage and culture, deepen our ties to the land of Israel and the Hebrew language, and celebrate our diversity and richness of perspective.

As partners in this great Zionist enterprise, let us reaffirm the moral and ethical values so deeply rooted in our holy land and ancient tradition, and ensure that human dignity, respect for the other, and a spirit of unity come forth from our people, from Yerushalayim.

Nava and I wish you, am Yisrael and Medinat Yisrael, a New Year that brings the sweetness of peace, promise and prosperity.

Much work remains to be done: Moshe Ronen, CJC

The High Holy Days are fast approaching. Each of us is called upon to reflect on what has transpired over the past year, to learn from our failings and to work on self-improvement over the coming year.

This Rosh Hashanah will be my last as president of Canadian Jewish Congress. On a personal level, I approach this New Year with a sense of pride in what we have achieved to date, yet ever mindful of the objectives we have not yet reached. As a community, Canadian Jews have a similar sense that much work still remains to be done, on behalf of our own community, the State of Israel and Jews in the Diaspora, as well as our fellow Canadians and the larger world of which we are an integral part.

Canadian Jews have demonstrably contributed to the well-being and the quality of life of all Canadians. Yet racism and anti-Semitism not only linger, but find new ways of manifesting themselves. CJC will continue its pivotal role in defence of the Canadian Jewish community and our multicultural democracy, keeping hatemongers on the margins of our society and advancing measures that counter prejudice and discrimination.

The federal government has won a number of cases against individuals complicit in Nazi war crimes. The Jewish community has succeeded in making proceedings against war criminals in Canada a part of the orderly administration of justice in this country. But the government must now put its resources into one final effort before the biological clock runs out, which will truly legitimize Canada's commitment to not be a haven for today's war criminals, and its leadership role in preventing other crimes against humanity from being perpetrated.

Seven out of 10 provinces have already proclaimed Yom Hashoah as an official Holocaust memorial day for all their citizens, the others are soon expected to follow suit and

Israeli ambassador 'excited' to be back in Canada

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — With the new year comes a new Israeli Ambassador to Canada. In mid-September, Haim Divon arrived in Ottawa to take up the post which, he says, is the envy of his colleagues.

A lawyer by training, Divon entered the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs in 1975, shortly after receiving his licence to practise law and with that, his career took a sharp turn. He has remained with the ministry ever since, advancing up the ranks and enjoying a variety of assignments.

Divon's first foreign posting was as second secretary at the Israeli Consulate in Bombay. "Generally speaking, I have been very fortunate with the assignments I have been given," says Divon.

"For any diplomat, to begin with India was a treat. It gave me an opportunity to have a glance into a world that bears no resemblance to the world we know. To see the plight and the challenges of the developing countries helped shape my attitude, if not vision, vis-a-vis the developing world.

"For me, to be there during the time when Israel was isolated, to feel the warmth of the people towards Israel in Bombay, in spite of the cold shoulder from New Delhi, was an interesting experience."

Following his posting to India, Divon spent two years in Canada as consul general in Toronto. "Toronto was the exact opposite in terms of infrastructure, standard of living," he says. "This made it clear to me that we must not close our eyes to what is happening elsewhere."

Haim Divon

Returning to Canada as ambassador is very special for Divon. "This is the wish of every diplomat," he says, "to return as an ambassador to a country in which he served in his junior days, especially in a place which he enjoyed."

Divon has special memories of his years in Toronto and has kept in touch with some of the friends he made. "At that time," he says, "we worked very closely on the campuses, and many of the students from those days have become leaders in the Jewish community, people such as Moshe Ronen and Jack Silverstone."

Returning from Toronto, Divon spent two years in Jerusalem as an aide to Dr. David Kimche, then director general of the ministry. At the age of only 35, Divon was named head of the Israel Interest Section in Sri Lanka, a "small but complicated mission." During his posting there, the late president Chaim Herzog visited and was well-received.

While Divon was heading one of the desks of the Asian Division in Jerusalem, he was asked to become the co-ordinator of Ethiopian affairs. What began as a temporary assignment led to his becoming the co-ordinator of the inter-ministerial team responsible for the planning and implementation of Operation Solomon," the Israeli airlift of Ethiopian Jewry, and later, two years as Israeli ambassador to Ethiopia.

Divon's second-in-command during Operation Solomon was Amir Maimon, currently a counsellor at the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa. "I was the one who decided that Amir should be the co-ordinator on the ground at the embassy compound," says Divon.

"We were on the telephone constantly, and later, when I arrived as ambassador, he was my number 2 for a whole year. This will be a very smooth adjustment for us. I acknowledge his ability and talent, and I know that he is a great asset and doing a superb job."

For the past few years, while in Jerusalem, Divon has been deputy director general for international co-operation; CEO and member of the board of governors of "Haigud," a government association for the transfer of technology; chair of the inter-ministerial Steering Committee on Desertification; and chair of the environmental working group, Multilateral Middle East Peace Process.

Divon says his experience during the past

Preparing for Rosh Hashanah

From the editor's desk

Long before the last discomforting dropules of summer's humidity had been blown southward by cooler September breezes, the quiet, curly-haired tailor's thoughts turned to the approaching holy days.

He had to prepare.

Of course, preparations now were different than they had been before the war; but then, everything was different now than it once was before the war.

Before the war – rather, more accurately, before he was conscripted into the Polish army before the war – he was a young apprentice tailor learning his craft from his father, who had learned it a half century earlier from his father.

It was a wonderful way to be taught the secrets of the thread, the needle and the bolt of cloth: how to examine the fabric against the light; how to understand the deep texture of its weave; how to cut sparingly; how to stitch artfully; how to join pieces seamlessly; how to do business honestly.

Sitting with his older brother close by their father, he observed as the master traced the path where the thread would flow, folded the cloth, sewed, tugged, inspected, measured, tugged, sewed and inspected again.

For more than a decade, he and his brother sat alongside their father, watching and sewing. Eventually, he became an excellent tailor. In the process, he became an excellent singer as well. For, as the trio worked, they also sang.

It was joyful and pleasant, and, like the existence of most shtetl Jews, surrealistic against the poverty of a dirt-road village in early 20th century Poland, a spectacle of sight, sound and even occasional serenity.

In the month before Rosh Hashanah, the songs that filled the cramped work room were, naturally, prayers from the machzor.

The tailor and his two apprentices sang with the intensity that the season and their circumstances compelled: urgently, emphatically, a harmonic fusion of pleading and vulnerability, a choral readying of the soul for the Divine judgement that awaited them imminently with the sighting of the next new moon.

More poignantly however, they sang with empathy and understanding: Yitgadal, the cantor's kaddish – broadly, expansively, as befitting a fanfare of greeting for the One True Monarch; Areshet Sefateinu – assertively, yet hopefully, a reconciliation of confidence and anxiety; and Avinu Malkeinu, tearfully, a plea to Heaven.

Neighbours and friends literally lined up outside the small house/workshop to bring the tailoring trio the clothes that needed repair or alteration for yom tov. But they always found reason to linger a few extra moments near the house after they deposited their torn or threadbare garments and to return the very next day to inquire as to the state of the garments' readiness.

In truth however, the neighbours and friends came to the trio because they needed to hear the old tailor and his two young apprentices sing as much as they needed to have them sew. Nor was it an infrequent occurrence that from within the cluster of neighbours and friends milling in and around the house, a few people might join in the tailors' tunes, or hum a few lines, or simply close their eyes, swaying slightly in rhythmic consonance with the melody and the words that filled the air. It was Elul, before the war, in a dirt-road village in early 20th century Poland and everyone needed to prepare for the holy days.

Now, the quiet, curly-haired man was no longer an apprentice. He was an accomplished tailor in his own right. For the past seven years, since his arrival in Canada from the displaced persons camp in Germany, he operated a sewing machine in a garment factory in the heart of Yiddish-speaking Toronto at Spadina and College streets. He was paid on a piece-work basis, receiving a few pennies for each garment component (piece) he produced for the factory owner.

It was before Rosh Hashanah and he was determined to work even harder and faster than normal because he knew there would be no income on the days he would soon be spending in synagogue. Moreover, he was unable to accept any overtime that month because he was a member of a three-man High Holy Day choir that rehearsed in the evenings. Though in fact, it was truer to say, because the other two men in the choir were also recent arrivals from eastern Europe, the "rehearsals" were less practice sessions than they were wistful reminiscences of the life and the people they had lost barely a decade ago.

There was also the clamoring from his five-year-old boy. Lately, the youngster had latched on to the idea that he needed a cowboy outfit. Repeatedly he asked his father to buy him the same cowboy gear that his friends were playing with. No logic or reasoning, gentle persuasion or finger-wagging hectoring from the boy's wiser, older sister could make the child understand the truth of his parents' economic situation, let alone persuade him to abandon any hope of owning his own cowboy outfit.

It was an emotional, one could even say, arduous time for the tailor. Three or four nights each week, in the cooler breezes of the early September evenings, he walked to choir rehearsal. Familiar tunes hung in the air, but he always walked alone.

The night before Rosh Hashanah, the five-year-old couldn't believe his eyes. Propped up against the starched cotton cover of the punched-in feather pillow, more lovely and more radiant than a string of pearls in a downtown jewelry store, were two Hopalong Cassidy six-shooters, a Lone Ranger mask and a Roy Rogers hat.

The quiet, curly-haired tailor was ready now for Rosh Hashanah. —MBD

Coming or not, community girds for Zhirinovsky

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As The CJN went to press Monday morning, it was still not certain that notorious Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky would make his much-publicized visit to Canada.

One thing is certain, however: Reports in the Globe and Mail that Russia's most famous extremist would meet with a prominent rabbi in Toronto have been vehemently denied by leaders in the Soviet Jewish community.

"We have made it very clear that we do not want to meet with him," said Igor Korenvzit, chair of the Jewish Russian Community Centre's (JRCC) board of governors. "He is not a friend of the Jewish people. We want nothing to do with him."

Vladimir Zhirinovsky

And reports in a local Russian newspaper that proceeds from a concert Zhirinovsky would attend will go to Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children and the JRCC are also untrue, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman told The CJN.

Rabbi Zaltzman, spiritual leader of Toronto's large Russian-Jewish emigre community, said neither he nor any rabbi he knows of would meet Zhirinovsky.

Meantime, "everything is up in the air. So many things went wrong and collapsed," lamented Svetlana Galkin, spokesperson for the Russian-language Mix-TV program, which airs Sunday mornings on Toronto's Citytv station. The Russian-language broadcaster was to sponsor Zhirinovsky's visit to Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa from Oct. 2 to 6.

"There are many confusing messages," Galkin told The CJN Friday. "There is so much tension."

She said Zhirinovsky's timing depended on a trip he's making to Yugoslavia. His Canadian visit could be "a last-minute thing. He's quite famous for doing things impromptu."

The uncertainty surrounding Zhirinovsky's visit did not prevent Canadian Jewish Congress from asking immigration minister Elinor Caplan to bar the Russian politician from coming to this country.

In a Sept. 19 letter to Caplan, CJC president Moshe Ronen requested that Zhirinovsky, who has made many public anti-Semitic comments, be deemed inadmissible to Canada and that his visa, issued earlier this month, be revoked.

Short of that, CJC wants immigration officials to brief Zhirinovsky on Canada's anti-hate laws and the consequences of violating them. "If at any point during his visit he offends Canadian legislation, he should be removed summarily," Congress states.

Many of Zhirinovsky's past utterances would have constituted a violation of Canada's hate laws, Ronen wrote. "He has never repudiated his extremist past or apologized to the communities that he has vilified," he added. "Any rehabilitation of him is premature."

For good measure, Congress enclosed a list of quotes attributed to the explosive politician over the last six years. These include his many allegations of an international Jewish conspiracy; that Zionists "weaken" Russia and cause crime; and that Jews sparked the 1917 Bolshevik revolution as well as World War II, hence "provoking" the Holocaust.

"You will always find Jews where war is raging," Zhirinovsky reportedly told a 1998 news conference in Moscow, "because they realize that money flows where blood is spilled."

He has also talked of "saving the white race" from Asians and blacks.

But Galkin was quoted as saying that Zhirinovsky has toned down his racist rhetoric of late, and that anti-Semitism is no longer on his agenda.

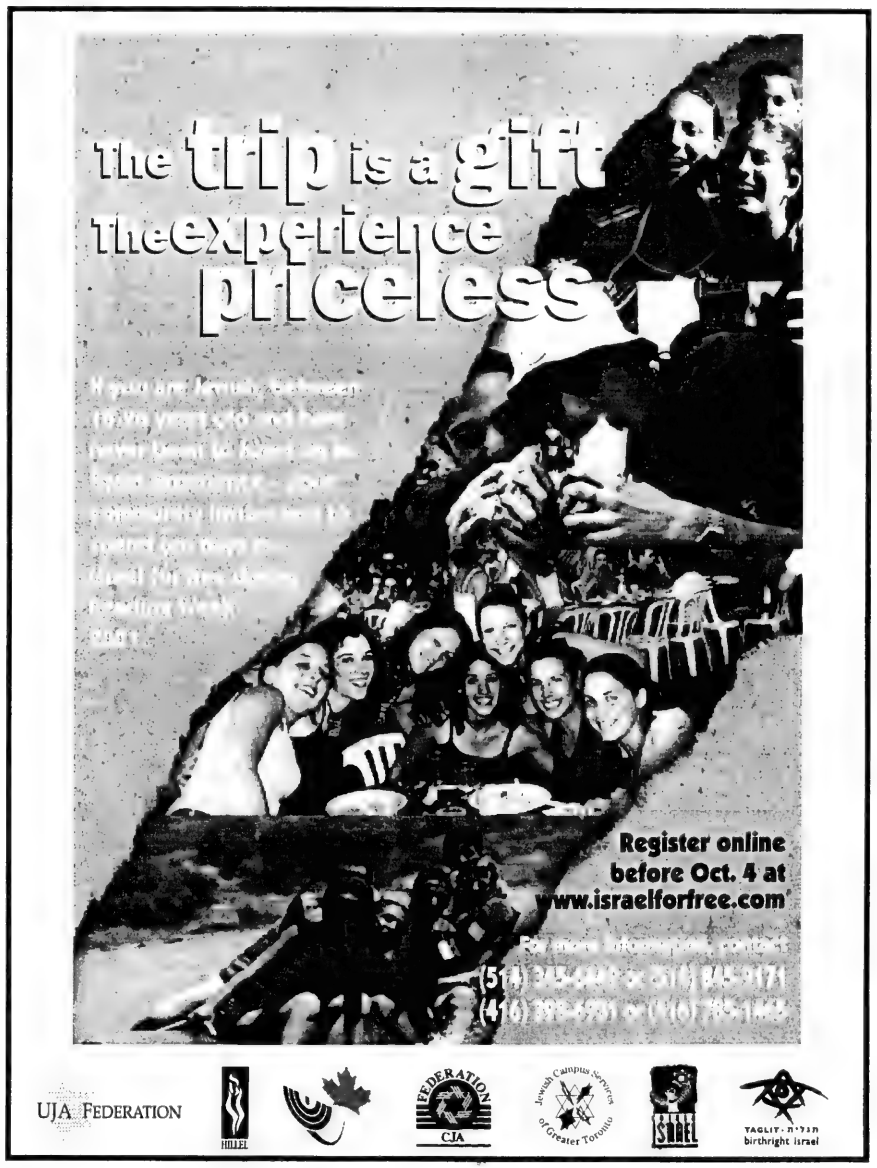
"He doesn't insult people as much," she said. "This is a chance for him to show his colours of late."

While Zhirinovsky's contempt for the United States is no secret, he is said to admire Canada.

In 1993, Zhirinovsky's Liberal-Democratic party shocked the world with a solid victory in Russia's parliamentary election. He is now a deputy Speaker in the lower house of Russia's Duma, or parliament.

In 1996, Zhirinovsky ran for president of Russia, and polled nearly six percent of the vote.

Often portrayed as a buffoonish neo-fascist, he has been refused entry into several European countries. In 1995, he visited the United States, where Jewish groups shadowed him in protest.



We have just one thing to say to those Jews who attend synagogue only on the High Holidays.

Welcome.

CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS ONTARIO REGION

A Rosh Hashanah Message from The Chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region

As we approach the Yomim Noraim (the Days of Awe), our community throughout Ontario and around the world will be joining together to begin a period of deep prayer, introspection and meditation.

This is a powerful time of the year: the symbolism of the Books of Life, Prosperity and Health being opened, inscribed and sealed; the efforts to make things right with friends and family before attempting to make things right with Hashem; the Kapporah and the intonation of the Kol Nidre prayer - from its soft beginning through its gathering strength. What images! They resonate within the neshama of every Jew.

In the year to come we will continue our commitment to fight manifestations of hatred and racism whether directed against our community or others. We will continue to press the provincial government to honour its ethical obligation to provide funding to all religious schools. We will continue to work with social and government agencies to eliminate the shame of child poverty. Along with our partners, the UJA Federations, UIA Federation Canada and regional Jewish communities across this province we will focus our attention on those key areas where service improvement for our community is required: more attainable social housing and proper services for the elderly.

May we all be inscribed and sealed for a year of health, happiness and prosperity. May we go from strength to strength as we strive to improve personal lives and the quality of life for every member of our community.

On behalf of the Officers and the dedicated staff of Canadian Jewish Congess Ontario Region I wish every member of our community a shana tova v'tikatayvu and a gut gezundt yahr.

'STAR' project targets revitalizing shuls

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A "STAR" was born last December in the North American Jewish community. The acronym stands for Synagogue Transformation and Renewal, an initiative of philanthropists Edgar Bronfman, Charles Schusterman and Michael Steinhardt.

At a 26-hour summit held in recently in Chicago, it was announced that STAR would spend $18 million (US) over the next five years to revitalize North American synagogues.

The funds will go for challenge grants ($500,000 per year for "innovative approaches" to synagogue issues such as membership, leadership, staffing, education and worship), a program to train synagogue consultants, interdenominational gatherings, internet-based professional development for rabbis, promoting awareness of synagogues and advocating increased federation and philanthropic synagogue funding.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation was the only participant from Canada among the 150 invitees at the summit.

Others included representatives of the four major streams of Judaism and a handful of federation people, as well as less mainstream participants – gay and lesbian rabbis, Jewish Renewal leaders, proponents of Jewish meditation, people from organizations reaching out to intermarried couples, and the president of the alternative seminary, the Academy for Jewish Religion.

Although Rabbi Frydman-Kohl spoke positively about the effort, he admitted there were "some blips" at the summit.

The so-called blips included Steinhardt calling the Reform and Conservative movements "accidents of history", and Bronfman — after stating that "rabbis don't own synagogues" — explained that he finds it more spiritually meaningful to perform the havdalah ceremony on Sunday nights, when he returns from his country home, than at the actual conclusion of Shabbat. The philanthropists' assessment was that liberal denominations may not last.

Many participants were angry and frustrated at the comments, according to a JTA report.

On the following day, Steinhardt said, "I gather that last night we ruffled some feathers," adding, "I'm sorry we didn't have a chance to argue and share thoughts. I hope there will be such opportunities, not for the sake of argument but for heaven."

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said he is hopeful that synagogue professionals will be "sophisticated enough to work with the funders so they will learn, and the synagogues will grow. There was a disappointing evening, but it shouldn't be seen as something that sets the process irrevocably backwards."

Had the audience been less polite, and had they not known of the initial growing pains of Birthright Israel – Steinhardt's and Charles Bronfman's program offering free trips to Israel to young adults in the Diaspora – a "significant number" would have walked out, said the Toronto rabbi.

At the summit's conclusion, Richard Joel — the Washington, D.C.-based president of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life — urged participants not to be cynical or put off by the donors' confrontational styles.

"They want to learn and often say outrageous things to engage people in conversation," he said of the donors, all of whom are Hillel supporters.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said it was nice to see a group of philanthropists who view synagogues as "one of the key entry points" into the Jewish community and "perhaps the key venues for developing Jewish identity and commitment."

In a small-group session, he shared some of the ideas being implemented at Beth Tzedec, the largest Conservative congregation in North America.

"Our philosophy has been to find small niches for people," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said. "You can't just have one project. You have to have multiple small efforts going on…Each piece builds on the other until you have a whole."

He believes the development of STAR will foster "the kind of nurturing of Jewish life that will create vital Jews."

Super Sunday raises $1.5M

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 400 volunteers made almost 15,000 phone calls and raised $1.5 million on Super Sunday, Sept. 17. The money will go to this year's UJA FEDERATION campaign, which has The Campaign for Our Children as its theme.

Richard Reitman, 10, said he wanted "to help the poor." He joined his mother, Jill and brother Sam, 13, as he has for the past few years.

Participating in the telethon is a learning experience for children, said Jill Reitman, sitting in the last row of phoners in a room made festive by arcs of multi-coloured balloons.

Almost 1,000 volunteers were expected to continue the phoning last week after the Super Sunday kick-off, noted Peter Eckstein, Super Sunday co-chair, who had three generations of his family volunteering.

"There are many children in the room today who are not going to be beneficiaries," said Ron Frisch, campaign co-chair. "Think of all the kids like them, who are."

Among beneficiaries who need the funds, organizers noted, are 600 kids in counselling programs and 7,000 living below the poverty line.

This year's campaign goal is $45 million, $4 million more than last year's total raised. The extra funds will be earmarked for youth projects.

Where brothers meet

On the site where the temple stood, two brothers once lived. The elder did not marry and was all alone in the world. The younger had a wife and three children. The brothers had no material possessions except a plot of land which they had inherited from their father. They loved each other so much that they did not divide the land. Instead, they worked it together, and when the harvest was over, they counted the sheaves and divided them equally placing them in two piles, each beside his own tent.

After the harvest one year, the elder brother lay down to sleep beside his pile. But he could not fall asleep because the thought ran through his mind: My brother has a wife and children to care for, while I am alone in the world and I work only to fill my own belly. It isn't right that I should take an equal share with my brother. At midnight, he rose, took some sheaves from his pile and silently placed them on his brother's pile. Then he returned to his place and slept peacefully.

That same night, the younger brother was also unable to sleep. He thought: My brother is all alone in the world. I have children who will look after me when I am old and unable to work. What will my brother do in his old age? It isn't fair of me to take an equal share of the produce of our field! So before daybreak, the younger brother rose from his bed, took a few sheaves from his stockpile, silently placed them on his brother's pile, returned to his tent and slept.

In the morning, the brothers saw that their piles were as large as ever. They were perplexed about this but did not say a word to each other. The same thing happened the next night.

On the third night, as the brothers were carrying sheaves to each other's stockpiles, they met midway, recognized each other, and wept, for they realized what had happened the two previous nights.

They left their sheaves on the spot where they had met and, without a word, returned to their respective tents.

God saw what the brothers had done and He blessed the spot where the brothers had met.

In later years, Solomon, King of Israel built the Temple on that very spot – the Temple from which the message of peace, love and brotherhood went out to the whole world."

Blessed is the place and the people where brothers meet.

If only this could be the tshuvah, the great turning and return of the Jewish people in the year 5761: that we meet – without suspicion, harsh words, anger, distrust, resentment or condemnation, – with all our brothers. Only thus, shall we and the world be truly blessed.

And let us remember to thank God for having granted us life, sustaining us and bringing us to this day, the beginning of 5761.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They were sentenced to between four and 13 years imprisonment. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

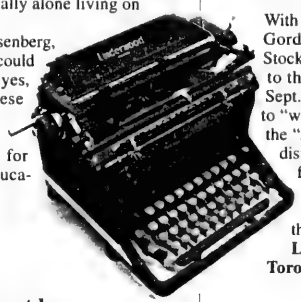
Many survivors totally alone

I would like to refer to a remark by Michael Rosenberg, acting president of Jewish Survivors of Canada ("Dilemma over property," CJN, Sept. 14). Rosenberg expressed an opinion that "most survivors have done very well for themselves – they are not in any breadlines and it is an individual's greed that exceeds his morality."

First of all I would like to ask Rosenberg whether he has ever seen a breadline and point out to him that many survivors, now in their 80s and 90s, some of whom lost children in the Holocaust and did not form new families, are now totally alone living on modest means.



It is not greed, Mr. Rosenberg, to hope that extra money could bring some comfort and, yes, a little luxury, to these people.

I would also like to go on record that I am all for Jewish education and education in general.

Should not have to pay for Kaddish

Re: "Mourning and gender: women reciting Kaddish" by Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz (CJN, Sept. 7). Judaism is entrusted to the female. You are a Jew if your mother is Jewish, and yet when you have to express your grief you are excluded. A female, as well as a male, should be able to honour her departed in prayer. You should not have to hire somebody to recite Kaddish, who recites for your departed and many others at the same time.

Letter writer has opposite view

It is obvious that Eric Mendelsohn did not read Rabbi Immanuel Schochet's article (CJN, Sept. 7), about which he wrote his letter to the editor (Sept. 21). Had he done so, he would have realized that Rabbi Schochet wrote the exact opposite of what Mendelsohn attributes to him.

Moreover, his poor metaphor to parody and ridicule Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef's words is not only a total distortion of that rabbi's regrettable statements but has no semblance to them whatsoever.

To paraphrase Mendelsohn's conclusion: It seems to me to be an error to devote any space to letters that display ignorance and gratuitous attacks on others.

Liberalism, Judaism not synonymous

With all due respect to my colleague, Michael Gordon, I am confused by his thesis that Stockwell Day's politics should be anathema to the values of Jews (Letter to the editor, Sept. 14). He then proceeds to cite the threat to "women's reproductive choice" as one of the "Jewish" values that Day threatens. It is disingenuous to cloak one's ideological differences with a candidate's platform in a tallit. Liberalism, despite the concerted efforts of those who attempt to equate the two, is not synonymous with Judaism.

Lorne Langer, MD

Judging someone by his friends

In his article, "In Support of Stockwell Day" (CJN, Sept.7), Michael Taube strangely argues that Stockwell Day "is the most pro-Jewish political candidate since Brian Mulroney's time." In order to rebut the charges of anti-Semitism that have been levelled against Day, Taube churns out the old political standby of "some of my best friends are Jewish," citing Day's childhood friendship with David Berger, Canada's former ambassador to Israel. I wonder how much Day was thinking of his Jewish friends during the time that he was making other "friends" in Bentley, Alta.

Writer Gordon Laird reports in a recent Now magazine article that Day used to frequently take his car in to be repaired at Jim Keegstra's garage. In my mind, giving business to one of the most notorious Holocaust deniers in this country hardly makes Stockwell Day "the most pro-Jewish political candidate since Brian Mulroney's time."

A Message of Peace and Hope

Excerpts from a statement by Israeli Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs Shlomo Ben Ami at the General Debate of the 55th General Assembly of the United Nations, September 18, 2000.

I stand here before you today as Israel's messenger of peace. The establishment of the State of Israel was the fulfilment of the dream of a people forced into exile two thousand years ago.

The destruction of the Second Temple, and the dissolution of Jewish statehood were the result of our failure as a nation to assume the proper political course, [our failure] to opt for accommodation with reality instead of engaging in messianic hallucinations. Our punishment was very severe indeed.

But, maybe it can serve as a lesson to those nations and leaders who today may be tragically led to believe that the dangerous inertia of romantic mythology and unrealistic dreams is preferable to the banality of a wise and prudent political course.

Most revolts are uprisings against a system; Zionism was a revolt against destiny. It is this expression of our re-encounter with the world of political realities, which eventually led us to the restoration of Jewish statehood in 1948.

Tragically, however, historical and geo-political circumstances have put us in a prolonged, bitter conflict with the Palestinian people…

We have been engaged, in the last seven years, but more intensely in the last year, in a major effort [toward peace and reconciliation] unprecedented in both scope and depth to resolve this 100 year old conflict. This negotiating process, and it alone, should be the foundation of a peace agreement…

My colleagues from the Arab and Muslim world, I hope that my words will convince you of the Israeli government's sincere intentions to achieve a comprehensive peace based on respect, dignity, and fairness, which will end the Middle East conflict and best serve the vital interests of the entire region.

The Jewish people have no quarrel with Islam. On the contrary, we have the deepest respect for that great Islamic civilization under whose wings Jewish history – from Al-Andalus to Turkey, from Egypt to Iraq, from the Jewish quarters of Tangier to Aleppo in Syria – has known some of its finest hours and most glorious cultural achievements. But even at the height of "the Golden Age," in the midst of the delights and wonders of Muslim Spain, our people never abandoned their dream of, and yearning for Jerusalem, as this was expressed in the words of the poet Yehuda HaLevi more than 800 years ago: "My heart is in the East, and I am in the furthest reaches of the West. To thee my soul yearns from the depth of the West."

We are a small nation decimated by holocaust and dispersion, but our heritage is rich. It was from our eternal capital Jerusalem which according to a Muslim source, "in the days of the people of Israel … was an area larger than Cairo and Baghdad," that the message of monotheism was projected to humanity. The Jewish holy sites and shrines in Jerusalem are the very heart of the Jewish faith, identity and history.

For the past 2,000 years, Jews have turned toward the Temple Mount in prayer three times a day. "If I forget thee O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning. Let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I don't recall thee" they pledged in joy and in sorrow.

Nonetheless, we do not claim exclusivity on all the holy sites, as indeed Isaiah's prophecy promised: "For my house shall be called a House of Prayer for all peoples."

For the past 33 years, Israel has consistently demonstrated its commitment to freedom of religion and worship in Jerusalem. Heads of the various religious denominations in Jerusalem will attest to the fact that the city has never been so open to all believers. During the last month of Ramadan, a record number, unheard of in the annals of Islam in Jerusalem, of more than 400,000 Muslim worshippers attended Friday prayers at the El-Aksa Mosque.

I note this as an example of the deep respect which Israel has for Islam and its followers. Just as we do not question the sincerity of the sentiments of others toward their holy sites in Jerusalem, we expect that others will not question the Jewish people's deep, awesome attachment to Jerusalem and its holy sites – from which we will never again be parted.

Politicians need not distort God's intentions for the sake of negotiations. How refreshing it is that a great number of Muslim scholars should attest to the fact that, as the Supreme Court Judge Mujir Aldin Alkhanbali wrote in The History of Jerusalem and Hebron, "David reigned for 40 years and before he died he passed the monarchy on to his son Solomon and told him to build the Temple (Beit Almikdas)." This expression, Beit Almikdas, that is the House of the Temple, became indeed in many Muslim sources a synonym to the word "Jerusalem"…

It is a travesty of historical truth to present the Palestinian refugee problem as the result of mass expulsion. There is no denying, however, that once the Jews, who for thousands of years waited with humility for their redemption, made their re-encounter with history as a sovereign nation, they had to assume the inherent immorality of war. The suffering of the civilian population will always be a burden on the conscience of any nation at war. The Arab-Israeli conflict has no monopoly on this maxim.

Clearly, the Palestinian refugees were victims of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Israel, however, can assume neither political nor moral responsibility for this tragedy that was the direct result of the all-out onslaught against reborn Israel launched by the Arab armies in 1948.

The Palestinian refugee problem was born as the land was bisected by the sword, not by design, Jewish or Arab. It was largely the inevitable byproduct of Arab and Jewish fears and the protracted bitter fighting.

We believe that, once established, it is the Palestinian State that should provide for the vindication of the Palestinian claim for the Right of Return.

The notion is preposterous that a nation should create a State only to gather its exiles in a neighbouring State. Israel, however, has expressed its willingness to actively participate in any international effort and fund aimed at providing the financial foundations for the resolution of the refugee problem. Out of humanitarian considerations, Israel may also accept a small and very limited number of refugees within a scheme of family reunification…

Ben-Ami with U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan. [RNS/Reuters]

To the Palestinians we say: we need to disentangle ourselves from this seemingly insoluble conundrum. We know that unless your and our wounds are healed, peace, not only the political peace but also that of the mind and the conscience, would not be complete. Yet, at the same time we realize that the total satisfaction of our respective dreams or presumed rights will lead us to perdition.

Hence, it is incumbent upon us to devise realistic ways that would heal without opening new wounds, that would dignify our existence as free peoples without putting into jeopardy the collective existence of each other. Peace is not about twisting each other's arms, it is about defining a common interest. I believe that such an ideal compromise is not impossible to achieve, while banishing the sword from this Land of God…

I call upon our Palestinian partners to realize that history has brought us to the moment of truth and decision from which we are not allowed to escape empty handed without inflicting severe punishments on our own peoples…

Israel is determined to pursue peace and take the calculated risks attached to it. But Israel will not compromise, not now and not ever, on those security and national interests that we deem vital. While building our peace with the Palestinians we cannot ignore security concerns inherent in the fact that this is not our last peace.

We still have a dispute pending with Syria, and we are still exposed to the most serious regional threats emanating from revolutionary powers in the area…

A major goal of the State of Israel upon its establishment was to become a constructive member of the family of nations. As an integral part of that family, we have, throughout the years, shared with other countries our experience in nation-building, immigration absorption and development and modernization processes.

Israel has volunteered worldwide its experience and expertise in agriculture, crop improvement, water management, arresting desertification, medicine, education, computer sciences, environmental policies and democracy. Israel intends to continue this policy of international co-operation, consistent with the goals set by the United Nations and in accordance with the spirit of the "Millennium Summit."

We are open to developing wide spaces of co-operation with our Palestinian neighbours and indeed with all the countries of the Middle East. But, we do not intend to impose our experience on anybody, nor is it our intention to assert our economic or technological presence amidst those of our neighbours who do not want it…

The tragedy of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict stemmed from discrepant historical rhythms. The history of our modern national movement has been characterized by realistic responses to objective historical conditions; the Palestinians have consistently fought for the solutions of yesterday, those they had rejected a generation or two earlier. This persistent attempt to turn back the clock of history lies at the root of many of the misfortunes that have befallen the peoples of the region.

Now it is time for all of us to overcome dire memories and look forward. Neither the physical nor the rhetorical war of images will bring us any closer to peace and reconciliation. No one has a monopoly on the mythology of suffering and atrocities. In this tragic dispute, we have all committed acts of violence that we ought not to be proud of.

To the Palestinians we say: we are excited with the prospects to overcome the troubled history of our relations in order to shape our dreams of peace.

Let us then join hands in asking the world which has been watching, perplexed at, and sometimes even fuelling, our wars to mobilize its resources for the benefit of our peoples. And, let us be full partners in this international effort to lay down the foundations of the Middle East of the future.

The creative energies of our peoples should be at long last put to work in the service of peace, for as the wisest of kings, King Solomon, the builder of the Temple in Jerusalem, wrote thousands of years ago, there is "a time for slaying and a time for healing … a time for war and a time for peace."

Reviving a memory

Last week it was my dubious pleasure to acquaint my readers with a book that deserves the strongest condemnation. This week, I do the very opposite.

Seeing that a new year will start tonight, I want to revive the memory of a poet who is either totally unknown by most Jews in the Diaspora or, even if the name rings a bell, has never been read. I refer to one of my heroes, Chaim Nachman Bialik, who died 66 years ago.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In Israel and for knowledgeable Jews outside of it, he is the leading figure in modern Jewish literature – both in poetry, which was his favourite, and also in prose. Since most Jews outside of Israel cannot, or do not, read Hebrew, the great man and his accomplishments have sunk into oblivion.

But it need not remain so. Recently, two highly respected Diaspora scholars, David Patterson and Ezra Spicehandler, have published a collection of Bialik's stories.

The new book titled, Random Harvest, has received rave critique, and justly so. The stories, which the translators from the Hebrew call "novellas," make for delightful reading and evoke a period of Jewish life that must not be forgotten.

I indicated that reviews of the book have been most laudatory and I take the liberty of quoting from two of them.

One was by Hanita Brand of the University of Pennsylvania, who writes: "An impeccable, flowing translation of Bialik's short fiction. For those not acquainted with Bialik's stories, this collection will prove to be an amazing surprise.

"In some respects, Bialik's literature seems more fresh today than at the time it was written. Modern Hebrew's towering poetic genius created in his fiction pieces a real flesh-and-blood Jewish world – neither sugary and idealized, nor demonic and sin-ridden."

Another review, by Rachel Feldhay Brenner of the University of Wisconsin, has this to say: "Once again professors Patterson and Spicehandler have made a significant contribution to the study of Hebrew literature. Their masterly translation of Bialik's stories performs the seemingly impossible: It achieves an intimate closeness with the inimitable texture and the unique flavour of the great poet's Hebrew; removes the barriers of language and offers the English reader a rare opportunity to enter the magic world of Bialik's imagination."

Random Harvest was published by Westview, and I promise you a delightful few hours if you take up my suggestion and open this slender volume.

I do not know whether our Jewish bookstores carry it or whether our libraries have it on their shelves. If not, you will help a good cause by strongly suggesting that they should add this jewel to their collection.

I wish you all a Shanah Tovah Umetukah.

Time and the City

What need is there, in the human heart, to dignify the passage of time with meaning, through symbol, celebration, ritual and sacrifice? All three monotheistic religions, Judaism, Christianity and Islam, demand that we arrange our lives according to a calendar which repeats itself every year, every month, every week, and indeed on a daily basis marks the passage of time.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Abraham Joshua Heschel has written: "Judaism is a religion of time aiming at the sanctification of time." Time, not space, was the essential binding thread of the religion. For Jews, history is not "bunk" (see Henry Ford) or "one damned thing after another," but an ordered progression orchestrated by Divine will and leading, although no one knows when, to redemption.

The Rabbis worked very hard to give each festival, originally agricultural calendar markers, a basis in historical events, to anchor us, as a people, to a God who acts in history. Rosh Hashanah, having no such agricultural base, came to mark the birth of the world.

However, as Yosef Haim Yerushalmi has pointed out, under the impact of the writing of modern history, Jews face a dilemma. "As a result of emancipation in the Diaspora and national sovereignty in Israel, Jews have fully re-entered the mainstream of history, and yet their perception of how they got there and where they are is most often more mythical than real."

Why is this? And why is it important to think about it at this time of year?

The Bible is very clear on what happens in history: If the Jewish people do well, we will prosper. If we do evil, we will be punished. For 2,000 years after the destruction of the Temple we blamed ourselves for Jerusalem's fall.

The Holocaust caused another terrible thought to intrude: Were we responsible for this calamity? Following the first course of thought, history is composed of bad things that happen to us when we sin. So, the Holocaust happened because – the thought is too terrible to finish.

We need a new way to think about time and history.

Let me return to Heschel, for whom the opposite of Jewish holiness in time was sanctifying space. Yet what are we doing, with our current dilemma over the fate of Jerusalem, if not attempting to make holy a space? This Rosh Hashanah some contemplate a war among the Jews over the physical boundaries of the state, and over the internal character of that state.

Somehow, physical space has become the mediator of our Jewishness. What has happened to time?

However much we love the idea of Jerusalem, to take a topic much in our thoughts this year, we should remember that real people live there, Jews and Arabs, Christians and Moslems. All have a sacred history connected to places within the confines of that city.

Often, however, we are thinking only of the Jerusalem "on high", and not of the Jerusalem "below." There are people living there in real time, not in some imaginary, ideal epoch. Surely we can allow a solution that will not lead to a third demolition of that city.

Yehuda Amichai, in Poems of Jerusalem, wrote:

"Once I sat on the steps by a gate at David's Tower, I placed my two heavy baskets at my side. A group of tourists was standing around their guide and I became their target marker: 'You see that man with the baskets? Just right of his head there's an arch from the Roman period. Just right of his head.'

"'But he's moving, he's moving!'

"I said to myself, redemption will come only if their guide tells them: 'You see that arch from the Roman period? It's not important; but next to it, left and down a bit, there sits a man who's bought fruit and vegetables for his family.'"

May we renew our commitment to peace among Jews in the coming year, not simply repeat our old conventions and convictions. Shanah tovah, u'veracheynu b'shalom.

High Holy Days Introspection

Recently, I have come down with a serious case of introspection. It happens every year at this time.

Once we enter the month of Elul and begin sounding the shofar, I am struck by an acute need to re-examine, in minute detail, the various elements which comprise my personal set of Jewish beliefs and practices. This re-examination usually focuses on the problem of balancing my Jewish life with my modern secular existence.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

My introspection becomes more pronounced as Rosh Hashanah approaches and reaches a fever during Neilah on Yom Kippur. Although I frequently lead the t'fillot (prayers) during the rest of the year, I make it a practice not to do so on the High Holy Days. I sit in my seat, daven together with my family and friends, and think.

When I hear that "the Gates are Closing," I know that I must come to some resolution of the inner conflict I wage between my theology and modernity. This year, however, I seem to be more profoundly afflicted than usual.

In all likelihood, one the reason for this year's acute case of self-analysis is to be found in my personal situation. I am living in Windsor but, for the coming year, my family will remain in Edmonton. As I return to Edmonton for the High Holy Days, I suspect that it will be the last time that I will daven the Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur liturgy in the familiar confines of my egalitarian conservative congregation.

For the past 20+ years, Congregation Beth Shalom has been an important part of our family's life in Edmonton. And now, I must find a new congregation in a new city – indeed in a city that does not have a conservative synagogue, egalitarian or otherwise.

Nonetheless, I blame my affliction, at least in part, on Joe Lieberman. Why him?

Simply because he seems to have come to a peaceful resolution of whatever inner conflict he may have once had about co-ordinating an observant Jewish life with a political career.

Indeed, he has undoubtedly caused a lot of people to reassess that particular point at which each of us has struck the balance in our own lives.

For example, there is the recent New Yorker article by Daphne Merkin titled "Trouble in the Tribe" and subtitled "How Jewish Do American Jews Want to Be?"

The article is not really about how Jewish American Jews want to be, but rather about how Jewish Ms. Merkin wants to be.

More importantly, and even more perplexingly, I am now the dean of a law school and I am trying to lead, at least, a semi-observant Jewish life.

How am I to strike the appropriate balance between my commitment to the University of Windsor Law School and my devotion to my Judaism?

Joe Lieberman seems to have figured this out, but I have not.

Recently, I was able to get some respite from my unceasing self-analysis. I spent 10 days with my family in New York visiting my sister-in-law and brother-in-law on the occasion of my niece's bat mitzvah. They belong to the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale.

HIR is a modern Orthodox congregation and is probably more familiar to people as the congregation led by activist Rabbi Avi Weiss. Even though I have spent virtually all of my practising Jewish life in Conservative congregations, I felt completely at home at HIR.

I have visited countless numbers of congregations and, in my experience, the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale is very unique. It combines, under one roof, an atmosphere of deep spirituality, a love of learning, and a commitment to social justice. (The learning, led by Rabbis Shmuel Herzfeld and Dov Linzer, was particularly excellent.)

HIR is an open, inclusive and welcoming congregation which, most significantly, is deeply respectful of other branches of Judaism.

It was an important experience for me. It helped me to understand the potential of modern Orthodoxy and provided me with another model in the search for an appropriate balance between my commitment to a Jewish life and the realities of modern existence.

I also discovered that this year, when Neilah arrives, I need not have my inner conflict between theology and modernity resolved. I need only commit to continue to wrestle with it.

Shanah Tovah!

The Kirshner File

Deputy minister Rosenberg dispenses justice

Morris Rosenberg was in his element, a Canadian studying law at Harvard University, when the call that changed his life came through.

The federal government in Ottawa was looking for new talent, and a recruiter from the civil service approached Rosenberg. He seemed like a good prospect. Rosenberg was a McGill graduate, having majored in economics and political science. He had taken a law degree at the University of Montreal. He had been called to the bar in Quebec. He had articled and worked for one of Montreal's finest law firms, Mendelsohn Rosentzveig Schacter. In short, Rosenberg seemed just right for the job.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Having enjoyed private practice, he considered the overture carefully. Impressed by the quality of the department's work, and confident that he had been handed a golden opportunity "to make a difference," he accepted the offer.

And so it was, in 1979, that he joined the department of justice as a counsel, posted to its consumer and corporate affairs unit. "I have never regretted it," said Rosenberg, who was recently in Toronto to deliver greetings on behalf of the federal government to the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists. "It's the best legal practice in Canada."

Twenty one years on, Rosenberg is Canada's deputy minister of justice and deputy attorney general, the first Jew to hold these pivotal jobs. He was appointed a little more than two years ago.

"They're very challenging positions," said Rosenberg, who, as top civil servant in the Department of Justice, supervises the activities of some 1,600 lawyers across the country. "I've never been tempted to go back to private practice."

Although he has spent much of his two-decade career in the Department of Justice, he has also worked in the Privy Council as assistant and then as deputy secretary to the cabinet.

In retrospect, Rosenberg has indeed made a difference. He played an integral role in reforming the Competition Act and the bankruptcy law, and helped put the finishing touches to Canada's free trade agreement with the United States.

As a Privy Council official, he was exposed to a huge range of issues related to the inner workings of government. "I picked up a sense of where things fit into a government's agenda."

Beyond this, Rosenberg made forays into international and constitutional law, first in a $13 billion anti-trust suit turning on uranium and then in drafting the search and seizure provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedom.

Thanks to the charter, Rosenberg, 48, probably exerts more influence as deputy minister of justice than many of his predecessors. "With the advent of the charter, we're increasingly seeing public policy questions, like assisted suicide, abortion and prisoner voting, becoming legal questions."

The people best placed to interpret these issues are the Department of Justice's corps of lawyers, said Rosenberg, who works with Justice Minister Anne McLellan. In former times, their traditional role was reactive, but today they are on "the ground floor of policy formulation."

Currently topping his agenda is refining the criminal justice system, with emphasis on young offenders. Rosenberg's department is modifying the Young Offenders Act, which has come under fire as being too lenient.

Aboriginal issues are also of importance. They range from land claims and allegations of abuse at residential schools to aboriginal participation in the administration of justice and greater community safety.

Rosenberg, too, is immersed in the issue of crimes related to globalization and advanced technology (computer encryption and satellite imaging and communications).

"Crime follows opportunity, as the saying goes, and there are now many more diverse opportunities for criminals. There are opportunities for new crimes and new ways of committing old crimes, often at long distance and across borders using telephones or the Internet."

Computers, he warned, have been a boon to hatemongers. "They can be used to create, copy and store (racially inciteful) material. They can be downloaded and stored in formats that are difficult for law-enforcement officials to locate and use as evidence in criminal proceedings. They can be electronically imported and exported out of reach of customs controls."

Rosenberg said that governments on the federal and provincial levels have taken steps to deal with the dissemination of hate propaganda and to ensure that Canadians are protected from discrimination.

Morris Rosenberg

"The federal government introduced legislation (Bill C-41) that is now in force to make it clear that hate motivation is an aggravating circumstance to be factored in on sentencing. The government also amended the Canadian Human Rights Act to add sexual orientation to the prohibited grounds of discrimination."

According to Rosenberg, federal, provincial and territorial justice ministers are examining the issue of offensive content on the Internet, including hate propaganda, and considering whether changes to the Criminal Code are necessary in light of these technological advances.

"But it is important to remember, however, that changes to the criminal law can only be a part of a much broader strategy to combat hate-motivated activities in this country," he said. "Public awareness and education on the values of tolerance and respect are also important so that Canadians will not tolerate the spread of hate."

As deputy justice minister, he has not personally handled the war crimes file. And while he is acutely aware that the Jewish community is hardly enamored of Canada's less than brilliant record in grappling with World War II-vintage war criminals, he pointed out that the government has not exactly stood still.

Seventeen investigations have been opened, more are pending, and new extradition legislation has been passed. "We're dealing with it," he said.

Rosenberg believes that the justice system is under intense pressure to adapt to what he describes as "new realities."

These changes are driven by a number of factors, chief among them are: developments in information processing and telecommunications and the increasing links between those technologies; the emergence of a more educated and informed population; and the increasing role and reach of the mass media.

One of his priorities is making the law – and the justice system in general – more accessible to Canadians by plain language drafting and the greater availability of information.

"Legal texts are dense, often obscure documents, steeped in language rarely used by the average person." To that end, the Employment Insurance Act is being revised so that it is more readable, while bulletins and advanced ruling certificates are being published so that citizens are encouraged to comply with the law.

Born and raised in Montreal's Cote des Neiges district, the son of a Holocaust survivor from Poland, Rosenberg began thinking of studying law toward the close of his studies at Northmount High School.

"I was interested in the whole issue of social justice and how it could be applied in a diverse society with different economic conditions," he explained. "Law is a fundamental value of government."

But, as Rosenberg – a film buff, a reader of biographies and a jogger – acknowledged, he was something of a late bloomer.

"I caught the academic bug in the middle of university and certainly in law school. I was unfocused, and there was a lot of learning to be had outside the classroom."

Rosenberg – an only child whose late father Issie was a clothing worker and whose mother Mary still lives in Montreal – is married to Sherill Besser, a lawyer in the Department of Transport he met at the University of Montreal.

The parents of two teenaged children, they live in a sedate neighbourhood in Ottawa, the Glebe, and are members of Agudat Israel, a Conservative synagogue.

As a Jew in the civil service, Rosenberg has never felt the sting and humiliation of discrimination.

But he allows that his present-day position may have been out of his reach 10 or 15 years ago, when the Department of Justice was far less ethnically and religiously heterogeneous than it is today.

As he put it in the cautious, understated style of a lawyer: "There are a fair number of Jewish lawyers in the department today. It is more diverse than before."

A time to reflect, a time to rejoice

By JOYCE SINGER D'APRILE
Special to The CJN

Shanah Tovah! What a wonderful time this is; a time to reflect, and a time to rejoice. This is what some of our notables have to say about this special holiday:

Barry Seltzer is a Toronto lawyer, and the author of humorous books, including It Takes Two Judges to Try a Cow. Seltzer and his wife Fran Chodak, a nutritionist, have three children.

Barry Seltzer

"I enjoy spending time with my family. My parents moved here a few years ago from Montreal, and we'll spend time with them and our friends. I go to synagogue, sometimes grudgingly," he said.

"Growing up, these holidays were great. I remember it being a very peaceful time for me. My grandfather Sam was a member of an Orthodox shul in Montreal – which no longer exists. I would go with him, and in fact on my bar mitzvah, I performed the entire Saturday morning services. For many years after he died, I didn't attend synagogue a lot.

"My daughter just graduated [from] United Synagogue Day School and I find as I'm getting older, I am getting more religious. The USDS campus on Bayview in Richmond Hill doubles as a synagogue, and that's the one we've been attending."

Rosh Hashanah Round up

Artist Anne Mirvish is the matriarch of the entrepreneurial Mirvish family. "It's really weird that you're calling me about [Rosh Hashanah]... because I never dreamed that I'd be spending the holidays in Germany," she said.

Anne Mirvish

"I'm a member of the International Federation of the Medal [and I'll be at] their 27th congress in Weimar. Some people put in four and five pieces, hoping they'd get them all in, but... it's juried. I had no time; I'm under terrific pressure at the moment because we're also moving. I said to myself, 'I'm sending them one piece; I've never been refused before.'"

"I have very mixed feelings about spending the holidays in Germany. This is weird; I remember when I wouldn't go near Germany... I will try and arrange to go to a synagogue there, but I will be back home for Yom Kippur."

Over the next couple of years, the CBC will be airing a two-year television series called Canada: A People's History, beginning Oct. 22. Jill Offmann directed the series episode featuring the 1930s era.

Jill Offmann

"For the holidays I will go to the Holy Blossom synagogue with my family," Offman said. "We're a big unwieldy family, with around 20 people, including my brother, stepbrothers, the spouses and kids, and we'll have a few meals. The High Holidays are on the weekends this years, so I won't have to miss too much work, with the series starting very, very soon.

"I'm looking forward to the fact that it's the first High Holiday that my two-year-old will be able to understand, and I'm sure she'll enjoy the food, if she's ready for apples and honey."

In his career, Dr. Neil Naftolin, nicknamed "the Joke Doctor" has counted Elvis Stoijko among his patients. He's also a popular personality on the amateur comedy circuit, so no one leaves his office without hearing a joke or two. He is a guest lecturer on humour, as well as on podiatry.

"I'm not a super-religious person, but I've never missed a year of synagogue on the High Holidays," he said. "I guess the plan is to get together with our family, which is our tradition. But unlike growing up, when we were kids, we only had one family, now we have two families, my wife's family and mine. So over two nights we have to decide which family we see on which night.

Dr. Neil Naftolin

"It's balancing two families. We'll have a full house with my three kids, as one of my children is coming home from Waterloo for the holidays, which is great. Our families compete over who makes the best matzah ball soup, but my kids are very diplomatic. They have to be!"

'Right of Return' committee formed by Canadian Palestinians

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's 10,000 Palestinians have launched a major initiative to support the right of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to return to Israel.

While the initiative has not escaped the notice of national Jewish groups, they say it should have virtually no impact on Canadian foreign policy.

The decision to form the "Right of Return" committee was taken earlier this month by 25 leaders and activists in the Palestinian community, including four former presidents of the Canadian Arab Federation (CAF).

The initiative is part of an international effort. Earlier this month, demonstrations in support of the Palestinian right of return were held in Washington, London and Israel.

Canadian Jewish Congress is taking the Palestinian campaign seriously.

However, the effort seems out of step with the policies of the Palestinian leadership and the entire peace process, says Harold Brief, who chairs CJC's Israel affairs committee.

> 'It looks like they want to scuttle the peace process': CJC's Brief

"It looks like they want to scuttle the peace process," Brief told The CJN. "Peace has to be built on bilateral negotiations, and that is Canada's official policy, and I don't think that will change."

Besides, Brief added, Palestinian refugees were created by the 1948 War of Independence, "a war Israel didn't want. If there had been no war, there would be no refugees now."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) shares the view of every government of Israel to date "that there cannot be and should not be a Palestinian right of return to pre-state Israel," says the CIC's David Goldberg. "The right of return would do irreparable harm to the democratic and Jewish nature of Israel and would fundamentally rewrite the historical record.

"The right of return implies that Israel was somehow responsible for creation of a Palestinian refugee problem and therefore must find a solution. This is a completely false reading of history. The refugee problem of 1948-'49 was a direct consequence of war waged on Israel by the Arab world."

According to a study written by the CIC, "Israel does not bear moral and legal responsibility for the Palestinian refugee problem."

Goldberg said he hopes Ottawa will ignore the Palestinians' plea because it is "counter-productive" to the terms set out in the Oslo peace accords.

Both sides in the issue agree Canada plays an important role. Since 1992, Canada has chaired the Refugee Working Group (RWG), one of five working groups under the multilateral round of Mideast peace talks.

Many experts have noted that over the past few years, global opinion has shifted away from the physical right of return for Palestinians, and toward financial compensation for them.

Over the decades, there has been wide disagreement on the number of Palestinian refugees. The United Nations puts the figure at 3.5 million; Israel estimates the total is around two million, while Palestinians have said the number is over five million.

Following the 1948 War of Independence, 726,000 Palestinians became refugees. Only 156,000 remained in Israel proper.

Israel has always unequivocally ruled out the right of Palestinians to return to their pre-1948 or pre-1967 homes.

The right of Palestinian refugees to return to their communities of origin was recognized by the UN when it passed Resolution 194 in 1948, says a statement from the Palestinian group. Palestinians are the world's largest refugee population, it adds.

"Palestinians are only asking to be allowed to exercise the same rights that World War II Jewish refugees have enjoyed in Europe since 1945."

The group says its expects "well over" one million Palestinian refugees would exercise their "right of return" to Israel.

Palestinian spokesperson, James Kafieh, a former president of the Canadian Arab Federation, conceded he doesn't think the Canadian government is serious on this subject.

However, he said his organization hopes to include members of other ethnic groups, including Jews.

"We hope progressive elements in the Jewish community will get involved. We don't believe the Jewish community is a monolith, and I don't think the Jewish people will remain silent on the subject."

Vivid, lively and opinionated

From Dawn to Decadence, 1500 to the Present*, by Jacques Barzun, Harper Collins, $54.50

Books
Bernard Baskin

Over the past several months, I have been reading an astonishing and monumental work that is nothing less than a fully rounded introduction into the life and accomplishments of western man over the past half-millennium.

The author, now 93, is a long-time university professor and the author of more than 30 books on a wide range of subjects. This volume (800 pages of text) is crammed with information and the experience and reflection of a lifetime. Intended for the general reader, its style is vivid, lively and opinionated, marked by clarity and ease of expression. It surely provides what used to be called a "liberal education."

Barzun describes, evaluates, judges and brings to life axial cultural events, notable personalities and seminal ideas from the time of the Renaissance and the Protestant Reformation, to the American and French Revolutions, to the great World Wars and the significant paradigm changes of our own era.

The reader is often taken aback by views and opinions that are at variance with the modern sensibility. Samuel Pepys, for example, after seeing Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, wrote that it was the worst play he had ever seen. He was no more complimentary about A Midsummer Night's Dream, which he called a most insipid and ridiculous play. Twelfth Night, he felt, was well acted, but silly.

In the book's final chapter, the author laments what he believes is the decline of modern society. He projects an observer who, three centuries hence, comments on the breakdown of our culture.

Some reviewers and critics regard Barzun's jeremiad as one-sided, curmudgeonly and unduly pessimistic. But some of his shafts certainly find their mark. In looking at American political elections, the observer notes: "To be elected took millions of dollars. The economic and ideological interests provided those millions, often divided among rival candidates so as to forward the cause no matter who won. Campaigning largely bypassed issues and dealt in attacks on character. Candidates were coached by experts in what they should say; the public was informed in 30-second television 'bites.'"

Interest in sports, the observer of the future reported, was widespread and enthusiastic, but amateurism was in decline and corruption was rife. Professionals cheated for money or by taking body-enhancing drugs. Widely-acclaimed sport heroes committed violent crimes.

"When contests pitted together two national teams, one crowd of fans mobbed the other; riots, wounds and deaths were the sportsmanship of the day. At the same time, without sports, colleges and universities would have lost their standing and alumni money. Sports were the last refuge of patriotism."

Displaying elderly crankiness, Barzun has his observer declare that "when an electrifying drug was put on the market, the millions who rushed to obtain it numbered the healthy young as well as the ailing old, and women at once demanded its feminine equivalent. It was apparently not known that desire must be dammed up to be self-renewing."

Reading this endlessly absorbing work is akin to participating in a spirited forum or seminar with a witty, brilliant and informed mind.

'A time to be silent, time to speak'

By RABBI MOSHE STERN

Rabbinic Reflections

In the confessional of Yom Kippur, we refer a number of times to speech as an agent of sinning. We mention the sin of dibur peh, of offensive speech; we recall the sin of vidu peh, insincere confession, and also ask for forgiveness for tipshut peh, foolish talk. Nowadays, with global amplification of speech and enhancement of the media of communication, speech can be misleading and inflammatory and serve as the cause of untold sin.

The reading of the Torah on Yom Kippur, as interpreted by some rabbis, brings to our attention the sin of silence. Silence may be golden on some occasions, but at other times it can lead to tragedy.

We read about an allusion to the death of Nadav and Avihu, the two sons of Aaron, the High Priest. According to the version in tractate Sanhedrin (52a), the cause of their premature demise was: "When Moses and Aaron were walking in the way and Nadav and Avihu followed them, Nadav said to Avihu: "When will these two elders die and you and I will lead the generations?" Because of such ignoble utterances, both sons perished.

As we read of the events leading to the tragedy, we are at a loss to understand it. We concede that Nadav sinned by mouthing words of treachery to Avihu. But what was the sin of Avihu who only listened and said nothing? Yet, he was as guilty as his brother. Why?

By considering that Avihu was as guilty as Nadav, the rabbis assert that there are times when silence is a sin, there are times when silence becomes a conspiracy subject to drastic punishment.

Silence is fraught with guilt when a people or a society are m'halchim baderech, en route to a destination. When the future is uncertain and unstructured, when clashing ideologies vie for supremacy, a person cannot shirk his responsibility by remaining silent. He must be articulate against strident voices that shout slogans, superficially appealing, but invalid and even destructive if implemented.

The unconcerned majority, be it in universities or in communities, is threatened by organized, rabid minorities. Its silence is tantamount to an acquiescence to the policies peddled by the shrill voices of the militants and the activists.

Jewish life is still being crystallized in North America amidst a great spiritual ferment and an authentic quest for new meanings. Often, those who are the most vocal do not represent traditional Judaism. Their brand of Judaism is based on an universalistic utopianism, a generous philanthropy garnished with a relish of esthetics and a tinge of Israel all wrapped in a neat package labelled "Judaism." When we do not expose the wilful omissions and genuine ignorance that hide behind its glitter, we are as guilty as Avihu.

The spirit of permissiveness pervades all areas of life, even the sanctuary. The gimmicks utilized to gain attendance and the techniques exploited to obtain the momentary flashes of prominence often undermine true Judaism. If we remain silent and do not proclaim in ringing tones the true precepts of Judaism, we become accessories to a diluted faith.

In particular, parents seek to curry favour with their children by glossing over the relevance of Judaism to the issues of the day. Again, this kind of abjuring silence can be destructive.

We must make a distinction between two kinds of silence. When the tragedy of the death of his two sons strikes Aaron, the Torah laconically states: Vayidom Aharon (and Aaron was silent). That type of silence was meritorious. The Talmud says (Z'Vachim): "He was silent and was rewarded." And David's exhortation corroborates this statement with the

Rosh Hashanah food

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Passover seder has matzah and maror. Chanukah nights are celebrated with latkes and sufganiyot. But what about Rosh Hashanah? While ushering in the Jewish New Year, we grace our table with apples, honey and some of the sweetest dishes of the Jewish calendar. Today, food and the High Holy Days.

Actually, Passover isn't the only holiday with a seder. One of the most interesting food-related customs of the holiday is the Yehi Ratzon (May It Be The Will) Rosh Hashanah seder. According to Rabbi C. Tscholkowsy, on the first night of the holiday, a series of foods is eaten whose Hebrew names have dual meanings of significance [http://www.google.com/search?q=cache:www.mznet.org/holidays/newyear/newyear.htm].

For example, the Hebrew word for black-eyed peas, rubyah, sounds like the Hebrew word for increase yirbu. The peas are eaten and the following prayer is recited: "May it be the will of our Heavenly Father that our merits increase." Other foods in the Rosh Hashanah seder are apples and honey, fenugreek, beets, dates, gourds, pomegranates, and the head of a fish or sheep [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/elulrosh/vol1no38.html].

Black-eyed peas are fine but what about the main course? There are plenty of Web sites bursting with New Year's suggestions. Mimi's Cyber Kitchen will tempt you with Beef Brisket with Onion Lemon Marmalade and a sinful (perhaps I shouldn't use that word in a Rosh Hashanah article) Chocolate Babka [http://www.cyberkitchen.com/holidays/highholidays/recipes.htm]. If you don't want to spend your holiday in the kitchen, then take a page from the cookbook of Myra Chanin and Ethel Hofman. They've given holiday recipes for foods that can prepared in advance, frozen and warmed up [http://cooking.phillynews.com/articles/0003evencooks.asp]. On their menu: Rosemary Roasted Cornish Hens, Carrot and Pumpkin Tzimmes and Honey Loaf with Cognac Glaze.

And if you prefer to enjoy your holiday meals without meat, you may want to pick up the Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook by Roberta Kalechofsky and Rosa Rasiel. You can read a review of the cookbook online and sample two of their offerings: Mock Chopped Liver and Van Gogh's Potatoes [http://www.charm.net/~marc/chronicle/cookbook.html].

But the bubbie of all lists belongs to the rec.food.cuisine.jewish archives where you will find almost 200 Rosh Hashanah recipes [http://www.cyberkitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=ROSH_HASHANAH]. There are five challah recipes (including Whole Wheat Honey), 15 tzimmes varieties (among them rhubarb and carrot) and an even larger assortment of honey cakes (such as Walnut Chocolate Chip.) Also check out the Jewish-food High Holy Days Archives [http://www.jewishfood.org/recipes/hhoindex.htm] or share your favourites at the Jewish Food and Recipe Swap [http://www.jcn18.com/scripts/jcn18/forum/forum.asp?ForumID=18].

This year, on the second afternoon of Rosh Hashanah, Jews will go to a nearby stream or body of water to perform the ritual of Tashlich [http://www.vjholidays.com/rosh/tashlich.htm]. Prayers are recited and sins are symbolically tossed into the depths. Some people even shake out the hems of their clothing while others toss bread crumbs into the waters. With that in mind, here's a contemporary look at the custom, Tashlich With Style: Fancy Bread to Atone for Every Sin on Rosh Hashanah [http://www.bethelsudbury.org/humor.htm].

"Taking a few crumbs on Rosh Hashanah to throw into the water for the Tashlich ceremony from whatever old bread is in the house lacks subtlety, nuance and religious sensitivity. Instead, this coming Rosh Hashanah consider these options:

- for ordinary sins, use White Bread;
- for sins committed in haste, Matzah;
- for immodest dressing, Tarts;
- for causing injury or damage to others, Tortes;
- for committing car theft, Caraway;
- for being holier than thou, Bagels;
- for sins of pride, Puff Pastry;
- for unfairly upbraiding another, Challah;
- and for wearing tasteless hats, Tam Tams."

Enjoy your soul food and have a very happy and healthy year.

'Let us emulate Aaron's ability'

following: "Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him" (Psalm 37:8). This is interpreted in the Talmud to mean: "Even though you suffer casualties, you remain silent." (Z'Vachim)

In both instances, silence is praiseworthy, because it reflects the capacity to bear anguish with fortitude, as evidenced by Aaron and Moses.

When a person possesses the power to be quiet and to remain in control when tragedy strikes, then his silence may be productive and vital to his future. We must cultivate the ability to be silent and not squander our energies when difficulties assail us. In such times, it is profitable to emulate Aaron's ability to be silent in the throes of a powerful emotion, and at the same time, to seek subsequent triumph over a condition that poses a bleak future.

Yizkor is, therefore, recited on Yom Kippur and festivals in order to foster these trusting feelings toward God and to enable us to face the death of our dear ones in a posture, not of despair, but of ultimate hope.

Yizkor fostors trusting feelings

However, when our ideals are threatened, then our silence is surely destructive.

A certain politician was absent for some time from Ottawa because, as he explained it, he had to be home to "mend his fences." Whereupon a rival of his said: "No wonder he had to mend the fences, look how long he sits on them."

Let us bear in mind that "there is a time to be silent and a time to speak." When the future is at stake, we dare not be Avihu, who listened to the treachery of his brother and remained silent.

All about us, irresponsible youth cries: "When will the elders die?" The young are anxious to dispatch those who have gone before them, to discard their memorable experiences and cherished ideals. Anti-traditional, anti-historical and anti-rational, anti-Israel movements are seeking to dominate the minds of our generation. They proclaim the death of God, the death of religion, the death of morality and of decency. Dare we remain silent?

Let us collectively raise our voices and pray to the Almighty for a year of health, Jewish nachas. Peace in Israel with Jerusalem as its eternal capital.

Ira Robinson: the godfather of Jewish studies in Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although he was born and raised in the United States, Ira Robinson is playing an integral role in building up Jewish studies in this country.

He is the godfather of two significant academic ventures that have propelled Concordia University in Montreal into the top ranks of the field: a chair in Quebec and Canadian Jewish studies and the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

"I was active from the beginning in the planning and negotiations leading up to the establishment of the chair and the institute," said Robinson, a professor of Judaic studies at Concordia, formerly Sir George Williams University.

Norman Ravvin, the incumbent of the chair, is also director of the institute, both of which were inaugurated in 1999.

"The institute marks a milestone in the maturation of Canadian Jewish studies," said Robinson. "It will contribute both to the pursuit of scholarship and to the dissemination of that scholarship to the public."

Currently located on the premises of Concordia's department of religion, Robinson's abode, the institute will encourage scholars to delve into the Canadian Jewish experience from historical, cultural and religious points of view.

And through the medium of lectures, workshops, colloquia and access to publications and resource material, it will serve the community at large.

The chair, initially supported by a $250,000 federal grant, spawned the institute, funded in large part by Charles and Andrea Bronfman.

Apart from Robinson and Ravvin, the Concordia faculty members most instrumental in pushing through these joint ventures were Norma Joseph, Michael Oppenheim and Jack Lightstone.

Robinson – the director of Concordia's MA program in Judaic studies and the past president of the Association of Canadian Jewish Studies – said that Concordia is now one of several universities in Canada with undergraduate programs in Jewish studies.

To the best of his knowledge, the others are McGill, York, Queen's, Waterloo and the University of Toronto.

Asked how developed Jewish studies in North America are compared to 10 or 20 years ago, Robinson replied: "In general, they have undergone an important change in the past decades. Many universities have acquired chairs in Judaic/Jewish studies. In many institutions, there are now several faculty members doing teaching and research in the field.

"Generally, the number of students seems to have increased, this in spite of a trend to cut back programs in the humanities and social sciences for budgetary reasons.

"We lost the department of Near Eastern and Judaic Studies at the University of Manitoba. On the other hand, there are four strong programs in Montreal and Toronto, as well as scholars in other universities such as Queen's, McMaster and the University of British Columbia."

A graduate of Columbia University and Harvard, Robinson teaches both undergraduate and graduate courses. On average per year since 1990, Concordia has had 40 to 50 undergraduate majors in Jewish studies, 12 to 15 MA students and three to five PhD candidates.

Among the undergraduate courses he has given have been Introduction to Judaism, Hebrew Bible, Modern Jewish Thought and Institutions, and Jews in Canada.

His graduate courses have run the gamut from Concepts in the Study of Judaism to American Jewry in Transition.

Robinson's areas of research and publication are medieval Jewish thought and North American Jewish history.

He wrote a doctorate dissertation and a book on Abraham ben Eliezer Halevi, a key figure of the generation of the Spanish expulsion.

Robinson, who was born in Boston in 1951 and is still an American despite his Canadian citizenship, is a 1973 graduate of Baltimore Hebrew College. He specialized in rabbinic literature, and was drawn to Jewish history because it was something he enjoyed and believed he could excel in.

Since coming to Montreal about 20 years ago, he has immersed himself in its rich Jewish tradition.

In 1990 and 1995, he edited two books of essays, An Everyday Miracle: Yiddish Culture in Montreal and Renewing Our Days: Montreal Jews in the Twentieth Century.

Over the years, he has written monographs for scholarly journals. They include The Kosher Meat War and the Jewish Community Council of Montreal, 1922-1925 for Canadian Ethnic Studies and David Rome as an Historian of Canadian Jewry for Canadian Jewish Studies.

"In Montreal, Yiddish is more of a factor than in most other places," said Robinson, who has a command of Yiddish, Hebrew, Aramaic, Spanish, French, Russian, German and Latin. "An example is the continuity of the Yiddish theatre company in the Saidye Bronfman Centre. It's true that the older Yiddish-speaking generation is passing. It's also true, however, that the fast-growing chassidic community in Montreal and elsewhere is raising a new Yiddish-speaking generation. The consequences of this for the future of Yiddish are significant."

Asked if Montreal's Jewish community is on the decline, he observed, "There is no question that it has undergone a basic demographic change in the past 20 to 30 years. But it seems to have stabilized at the current level. Juxtaposed to the explosive growth of the Toronto community, it may appear to be in decline. Looked at on its own, it is not doing too badly at all."

Can a mass exodus of Jews be expected if Quebec declares sovereignty and secedes from Canada?

"In such a case there will obviously be some Jews who will leave. Whether there will be anything approaching a mass exodus or not will obviously depend upon the circumstances of any Quebec separation."

Orthodox conference proving a tough sell

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The World Zionist Organization (WZO) will hold an Orthodox General Assembly (OGA) in Israel this fall, but it's finding the event a hard sell among Canadian Jews.

"I am having a tough time," admitted Eliezer Sheffer, chair of the WZO's Centre for Religious Affairs in the Diaspora. Sheffer was in Toronto, Montreal and New York City last week where he held meetings with Orthodox rabbis, educators and community leaders.

His goal was to entice North American Orthodox Jews to take part in the OGA and in four pre-OGA meetings, which will run in Jerusalem from Nov. 26 to 29. Sheffer said he's expecting 200 Diaspora participants and 100 from Israel.

The OGA will be preceded by meetings of The World Council for Torah Education, The Third International Congress of Rabbis, The World Conference of Jewish Communal Leaders and the International Think Tank of Senior Jewish Journalists.

> 'Develop and deepen the spiritual processes in the Jewish nation'

The OGA has set an ambitious agenda for itself. The conference is intended to bring together a broad spectrum of Orthodox leadership to "begin a process where they show interest, not only in their own communities, but in creating a Jewish agenda for the next 20 to 30 years," Sheffer said. The participants will discuss a joint vision for the organization and form a strategic plan to "develop and deepen the spiritual processes in the Jewish nation," states OGA press material.

However, it is the general nature of that strategic plan that is garnering a lukewarm response among Orthodox Canadian Jews. Kurt Rothschild, chair of World Mizrachi, an Orthodox Zionist organization, said people attending the meetings with Sheffer "wonder what will be the end of the conference; will it end up with some kind of activity?

"Promoting Jewish education, helping outlying communities, we all agree on that," said Rothschild, who helped arrange some of Sheffer's meetings. Local participants, however, were skeptical whether there would be any specific programs that will result from the event. He also suggested the OGA might have received more interest had it been scheduled in the summer and not in the middle of the school year.

Sheffer believes the time is right for the Orthodox leadership to respond to the requests the WZO has been receiving from small communities around the world. Jewish leaders in places like Panama, Bolivia and Costa Rica have been asking for assistance in setting up educational, spiritual and organizational structures to address the problem of continuity in their communities. Often the requests come from secular leaders, Sheffer said.

Sheffer, who has held a variety of posts in the Jewish Agency and the WZO, said "70 to 80 percent of the communities around the world are by definition Orthodox." They maintain an Orthodox rabbinate, their schools are Orthodox and their organizations follow Orthodox practices.

"So, if that is the case, to whom do they look for guides in community leadership, the relationship between rabbis and community leaders, and education?" he asked.

The OGA will bring together people to exchange ideas and develop relationships. "We are talking about specific elements in the communities and what they need. They need their own friends and colleagues," he said.

Already confirmed as OGA participants are Norman Lam, president of Yeshiva University; Rabbi Menahem Porush, chair of Agudat Yisrael; Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, former Chief Sephardi Rabbi of Israel; Prof. Moshe Kaved, president of Bar-Ilan University; and the chief rabbis of Britain, France, South Africa and Israel.

Sheffer is hoping for Canadian participation at the OGA. "I need Canada to be there with us, not only as a symbol, but because it is an important country," he said.

Canada's experience can help others learn how to educate their children and live in harmony with "other streams of people," he said.

But Sheffer acknowledges Canadian Jews are not rushing to register for the OGA. Sheffer believes several factors account for that: Canadians are not aware of the problems of small communities around the world. "They say we live in peace with Reform and Conservatives in Canada and why join a forum that's composed of only Orthodox leaders... We don't need it here." And finally, they're not sure they should get involved in Israeli political issues.

The last factor refers to a key element on the OGA agenda. The forum will address recent declarations by Prime Minister Ehud Barak that he intends "a secular revolution to change the nature of the state," Sheffer said. "It has to be dealt with by the Orthodox leadership."

Sheffer suggested that any diminution of the Jewish nature of Israel will lead to an estrangement of the Orthodox from the state. "If Israel is secularized, the Orthodox will have less connection to Israel" while secular Jews will not feel more connected to Israel, he said.

Tradition

Paul Stern, President

I remember when I was very small, I used to sit in shul on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur snuggled up to my Saba. I'd listen to Kol Nidre mezmorized by the beauty of the words and the music . . .

And when it was time for the Shofar to sound, I'd close my eyes and puff out my cheeks and pretend that it was me blowing . . .

And there was nothing more delicious than my mother's chicken soup or my Aunt Clara's desserts.

After all these years, all the familiarity, I still look forward to Yom Tov with great excitement. Now I celebrate these times with my family and I know these traditions will carry on.

In this changing world hold on to the things you can rely on

Torah way to do business examined

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Malden Mills, a textile manufacturing company in Lawrence, Mass., burnt down in 1995, it was obvious that many of the workers would have to be laid off during rebuilding. There was great consternation.

The employees feared the loss of income, and the town as a whole worried about the economic effect of widespread unemployment, albeit temporary. They also feared that the company would choose to move to a place where labour costs might be cheaper.

There must be a balance between economic activity and morality

They were all in for a surprise. President and CEO Aaron Feuerstein not only chose to rebuild on the original site, but paid the workers their salaries and benefits.

"It's funny," Feuerstein mused. "When the same thing happened 100 years ago, the owner wasn't praised at all, not like me. I guess it's a question of timing."

Feuerstein was speaking on a panel discussing the question of "Money, Morality and the Marketplace," held recently at Beth Jacob V'Anshei Drildz Congregation.

Other panelists were Meir Tamari, founding director of the Business Ethics and Social Responsibility Centre at the Jerusalem College of Technology, and former chief economist, Office of the Governor of the Bank of Israel; and Rabbi Aaron Levine, Samson and Halina Bitensky professor of economics at Yeshiva University.

Moderators and co-chairs were Rabbi Jay Kelman of the host congregation, and Mark Schwartz, lecturer on business ethics at the Wharton School of Business.

Feuerstein attributed the intense interest in his actions to the fact that "people give their work, loyalty and trust to a corporation, and they want the same back. The sad fact is that they don't get it back."

His values, he said, were "incubated at his father's table, where he learned lessons such as employers' responsibilities to their workers. They are our greatest asset," he said.

That may not always seem sensible, but that's the Torah way, he said.

Levine gave some examples of the Torah way to do business, such as not exploiting a salesperson by pretending to be interested in a product when you are not; and by treating your workers with dignity and respect.

Also, he said, we "shouldn't let ourselves be exploited by values that are not our own," he said, such as dealing in tobacco, or ignoring the evironment. "What kind of person benefits from human misery caused by such things as smoking or war," he said.

Efficiency may be an ideal in the business world, Tamari said, but efficiency is not a Torah aim.

Unlike Christian theology, there is no anti-business bias in Judaism, he said. "People are entitled to make a profit, and to earn a wage for what they do."

But there is a way to do that, he stressed. There must be an awareness that since food and wealth come from God, He is a partner in the business, and should have a say in what happens.

He criticized people who are moral in their personal lives, but "when they do business they change their personality into a corporate form."

This translates into the philosophy that "I don't cheat, or use slave labour – the corporation does.

"The corporation then becomes a separate moral entity."

A business person can't hide behind a corporation. "A Jewish corporation has to act in a Jewish way. If the Torah says 'no,' you can't pollute, or desecrate the Shabbat [or have your workers do that] then it's no."

There must be a balance between economic activity and morality, he said.

The community has obligations to care for the poor, the sick, the old, "even the lazy," Tamari said. It has the right and the obligation to take money in the form of taxes to help them.

However, he said, "if I am forced to give charity [through taxation], then there is a responsibility on my part and on the part of the community to see that it is not wasted."

Rabbi Moscowitz takes helm at Holy Blossom

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holy Blossom Temple is an extraordinary place in an extraordinary city, says Rabbi John Moscowitz, the temple's new senior rabbi.

"The temple has a seriousness of purpose with a long history of looking without and of looking within," says Rabbi Moscowitz, who succeeded Rabbi Dow Marmur, now rabbi emeritus, on July 1.

The congregation, which has about 2,400 member families, takes seriously its study, its worship, and its deeds of community service, he says. "There is an intensity here that is unusual in a liberal synagogue, and it has high demands of its rabbis. I feel privileged to have met those expectations."

Rabbi Moscowitz, 48, is ordained from Hebrew Union College. He spent two years as an assistant rabbi in Baltimore and studied for a PhD in Judaism at University of California at Los Angeles. "[Having lived in different places, I have learned] that Toronto is like no other city in North America. Community members have a tremendous sense of belonging and a strong Jewish identity."

When he came to Toronto, says the native of St. Louis, he had thought he would stay for five or six years and then return to the United States. "Something about Holy Blossom, however, is very compelling," he says. "I feel at home here, but of course when you feel strongly about what you are doing, you are always comfortable in your own skin."

Rabbi John Moscowitz

His goal, he says, is to ensure that the temple does not become a place primarily of "life cycle events and High Holy Day worship, the doing of some social deeds and the looking out after other personal needs.

"Serious and engaging prayer and learning, and deeds of uplift and responsibility build a vital community; each helps make Jews more Jewish," he continues. "Serious and engaging Torah, avodah and gemilut chasadim (deeds of mutual social responsibility) for the sake of a better synagogue community, for the sake of individual Jews, and for God's sake – that's our program, that's our purpose, that's our cause."

He avoids the term social action, he says, "because it is a political term, and if it is political, it means 'I'll do it if I agree.'

"In Judaism, we believe that we are required to do these deeds despite our sentiments. Religion goes beyond the politics of left and right. There are certain things that are required of Jews."

Only the synagogue, says Rabbi Moscowitz, "provides meaning, builds religious character and sensibility, changes and challenges the mind, and serves God and others.

"The mall does not do this, the hockey rink cannot do it, the attractive worlds of theatre and university and the arts do not build and sustain Jews. Unfortunately, many of our homes don't either. Only the synagogue – and even then, for most Jews, only a certain kind of synagogue – can do this."

Institutions in general, he says, have too much acceptance of mediocrity. "Everyone has to go beyond that, in worship, in prayer and in social responsibility. There is no formula; it is just how you think. You have to think differently."

Rabbi Moscowitz will be honoured at a special installation ceremony at Holy Blossom Temple on Oct. 29.

Hungarian-language newspaper knocks Jews, Israel

CJN News Services

TORONTO — A Hungarian-language newspaper available locally contains several articles singling out Jews and Israel for harsh criticism.

The latest issue of Hazánkért (for our homeland) alleges, among other things, that Hungarian women and girls are being enslaved as prostitutes in Israel. It quotes a supposed article in the Jerusalem Post and an alleged Amnesty International report titled The Trafficking of Women in Israel.

It also quotes the medieval Jewish philosopher Maimonides as saying that all non-Jewish women have the potential to become prostitutes, and says Israel condones prostitution and enslavement.

It also states that World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg, who rescued thousands of Jews from the Nazis in Budapest, and who has been recognized as a Righteous Gentile, was Jewish, and that he was related to the Swedish-born wife of United Nations secretary general Kofi Annan.

The paper is sprinkled with references to Jews as having dual loyalties, throwing their support behind the European Union, and not Hungary.

William Kosaros, editor of the Hungarian Jewish newspaper Menorah, said he thinks Hazánkért has a circulation of "a few hundred."

The paper lists a mailing address in Brossard, Que. and another in Budapest. Its editor, Judith Toth, did not respond to The CJN's requests for an interview.

URGENT APPEAL TO HELP A FELLOW JEW BLINDED FOLLOWING A VICIOUS ATTACK

Mr. Vizel, father of 17 children, was the victim of a vicious, senseless, anti-semitic attack in New York, that left him with severe head injuries and totally blind. As a result of the attack, Mr. Vizel is no longer able to provide for his family who now have the daunting responsibility of caring for their permanently disabled father.

No one should ever know the tragedy and suffering the Vizel family has endured and continues to endure. This once self-sufficient family has been reduced to relying on the generosity of their Jewish brethren for a meagre existence.

We ask everyone to help them in whatever way possible. There can hardly be a greater or more worthy Charitable donation.

Holocaust 'amnesia' revealed

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto scholar Frank Bialystok has ventured into a little-explored area of Holocaust research, and unearthed some fascinating, if troubling, finds.

In his just published book, Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community (McGill-Queen's University Press), Bialystok contends that in the years following World War II, Canadian-born Jews exhibited a collective amnesia when it came to the murder of six million of their European co-religionists; while Holocaust survivors who immigrated here were not only ill-equipped to speak about their horrors, but actually encountered indifferent or disbelieving ears.

The chasm between the two groups amounted to a kind of "two solitudes," each camp unable or unwilling to commiserate with the other. As a result, the impact of the Holocaust on the Canadian-Jewish collective consciousness would be delayed for many years after its last embers were extinguished.

Bialystok, 54, the son of survivors and a history lecturer at the University of Waterloo and the University of Toronto, interviewed dozens of community officials and survivors, and pored over sheaves of previously unexamined archival material. In short, he found that the Holocaust played a marginal role in the immediate post-war period. Canadian Jews ignored it for a variety of reasons, and survivors buried it. No one was talking, and no one was listening.

"Most Canadian Jews did not want to know what happened," Bialystok writes, "and few survivors had the courage to tell them."

Psychologically unable to grasp the enormity of an event that was not theirs and happened thousands of miles away, Canadian Jews were not prepared to empathize with survivors.

Canadian Jewish leaders "did little to instill knowledge of the catastrophe, and there was no grassroots desire for this situation to change. Simply put, the Holocaust was not part of their world. The community needed to distance itself from the loss because to have confronted [it], it was felt, might have produced a collective trauma."

There was also a shame factor; the mistaken belief at the time that Jews went to their deaths as sheep. Why would anyone commemorate that? And survivors were busy rebuilding their lives under a cloak of silence that was engendered by disbelief, incomprehension and even derision.

Bialystok looks for historical events that transformed the silence into action, and finds that 1960 was the year things began to turn. A spate of swastika daubings in Toronto was followed by the capture of Adolf Eichmann.

And in a CBC radio interview, U.S. Nazi Party leader George Lincoln Rockwell announced the existence of a Canadian cell. Survivors, by this time more secure in Canadian society, began to stir, and a year later, the Association of Former Concentration Camp Inmates/Survivors of Nazi Oppression (later shortened to the Association of Survivors) was formed in Montreal. But 1965 was the pivotal year. In May, then Prime Minister Lester Pearson delivered a speech on the 20th anniversary of VE-Day, in which he paid homage to Holocaust survivors. It was the first acknowledgment of the Holocaust, and of Jewish suffering, by a prime minister.

Also that May, riots broke out at Allan Gardens in Toronto, where George Beattie, the self-styled leader of the Canadian Nazi Party, was to have spoken. As well, a rousing speech by Canadian Jewish Congress official Sydney Harris on the urgent need to combat neo-Nazis groups shook CJC from its policy of working quietly and behind the scenes.

Two years later, the Six Day War threatened Israel's very existence.

The organized community, which was becoming less timorous, and survivors, who had by this time grown more confident and were politicized, were undergoing a rising militancy. But a gulf between them remained.

As Bialystok observes, it wasn't until 1973 that the rift was closed. Congress grudgingly brought some survivors aboard and created the Holocaust Remembrance Committee (of which the author was a long-time member) to deal with commemoration and education. At the same time, the community was finally successful in lobbying the government to criminalize hate propaganda. By 1973, "a cognizance of the Holocaust had materialized."

Bialystok's 327-page study ends in 1985, when the whole issue took off like a rocket. It was that year the Deschenes Commission began its inquiry into the presence of Nazi war criminals in Canada, the first trials of Holocaust deniers James Keegstra and Ernst Zundel were held, and when thousands of survivors and their descendants gathered in Ottawa for a conference. By this time, the Holocaust was an indelible marker of ethnic identification for Canada's Jews.

Delayed Impact will be officially launched Oct. 3 at 6 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building.

Concert honours Maritime leader

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Memories of the Maritimes recently filled the halls of Beth Tikvah synagogues, as 300 people gathered for a concert that paid tribute to Cape Breton, N.S. Jewish leader Dr. Phil Simon.

Highlighting the concert was Halifax musician Shirley Bernstein and her Northwood Players choir, who delighted the audience with a mixture of Hebrew, Yiddish and English songs including Russian Lullaby, Hinei Matov U'manayim and Oifen Pripechik.

The audience joined in several times, especially when Bernstein sang folk songs that originated at the Halifax-based Camp Kadima. Many in attendance were current and former Maritime residents who have fond memories of Simon, a dentist and fixture of Glace Bay's and Cape Breton Island's once-thriving Jewish community.

"Although we are in Toronto, 2000 miles away form Glace Bay," said Ben Prossin, former Glace Bay resident and current executive director of JNF's Ontario region, "we have the bond of a Maritime spirit and Phil Simon's drive that keeps us together."

Simon was born in Birch Grove, N.S., and moved to Glace Bay as a boy. It was in this coal-mining town that Simon became a fixture of Jewish communal affairs. He sat on the Board of Jewish Education, was on the Atlantic Jewish Council's executive committee and Camp Kadima's committee, and was president of the Congregation Sons of Israel.

When Simon moved to Toronto 10 years ago, he formed and became president of the Cape Breton Jewish Club and has been an active member at Beth Tikvah.

"I hope this concert will be a forerunner for more programs," Simon told the audience.

Victor Goldberg, president of the Atlantic Jewish Council noted the ambience of the concert brought him back to a time when Cape Breton's Jewish community was sizeable.

"Seeing all of these Maritimers in this room, bursting at the seams, makes me think about a community that was," he said. Cape Breton once boasted a Jewish community of 1,000, but that number has dropped substantially as many residents have left for Halifax and Toronto.

"Although we are struggling with demographics," Goldberg said. "we still have Camp Kadima." Goldberg noted the camp, which is attended by Jews form across Canada, enjoyed a successful summer this year with 280 campers and 100 staff.

To honour Simon for his efforts, his three sons, Mark, Gary and Bruce, have contributed money to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The funds will help pay for seven campers at B'nai Brith in Haliburton.

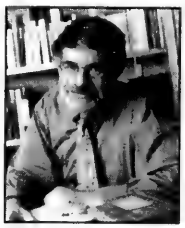
A Challenging Environment for Growth and Continuity

A MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR



According to the Mishnah, the Jewish year has four Rosh Hashanah days, each marking the beginning of a different aspect of the Jewish life cycle. The day we know as Rosh Hashanah marks the start of the calendar and agricultural year. Today, it also marks the opening of the academic year. It is a time both to reflect and to plan ahead.

Last year was especially productive at the Centre for Jewish Studies. We inaugurated the Silber Chair in Holocaust and Eastern European Jewish Studies with the visit of Israeli author Aharon Appelfeld and initiated a new course on women and the Holocaust. Research initiatives included Prof. Alex Pomson's study of teachers in Jewish schools seeking to learn what motivates young people to enter the teaching profession.

As part of our Centre outreach, the Leonard Wolinsky Lectures featured popular archaeologist Herschel Shanks. We hosted on campus a Holocaust Survivors' Group, CHAT, the Bnei Akiva Schools, and others. Centre faculty were active in professional groups and the community. Prof. Irving Abella served as president of the Canadian Historical Association, and Prof. Sara Horowitz was elected to the board of the Association for Jewish Studies. Among Centre publications were works on topics ranging from Bible to contemporary Jewry, and Parchment, the Canadian Jewish literary annual, has its home at the Centre.

As we look forward, next year promises to be as exciting as last. In the fall, the noted French film director, Claude Lanzmann, will visit the Centre to discuss his new film. We are mounting new courses on medieval Jewry in the Christian and Muslim worlds and on women in Hebrew literature. Prof. Eric Lawee is one of three scholars undertaking a pathbreaking research project, "Spain from Antiquity to the Renaissance," leading to the creation of a website and hypertext book. And the Centre will publish a comprehensive bibliography of Jewish Canadiana.

As the old year comes to a close, I want to thank all those who have supported our Centre, as well as the students and faculty who are its mainstay. As the new year begins, I want to invite students, faculty, and the community to join us in the unique learning environment at the York University Centre for Jewish Studies.

Best wishes for a shanah tovah and especially a shnat limudim tovah, a year of fruitful and exciting learning and of all other good things.

NEW INITIATIVES

A recent grant from the Covenant Foundation of New York will enable the Jewish Teacher Education Programme at York to offer incentive scholarships to students intending to teach in western Canadian day schools. The grant will facilitate collaboration between York and the Coalition of Western Canadian Day Schools.

A grant from the Dorot Foundation of Providence, Rhode Island, is funding student bursaries for summer study in Israel.

A new scholarship endowment established at York by the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University will support York students undertaking a year of study at Tel Aviv U.

An incentive grant from the Gales family of Toronto will underwrite a research programme of York's Jewish Teacher Education Programme at the United Synagogue Day School of Toronto.

Chief Justice Aharon Barak with Julia Koschitzky, chair of the Advisory Committee for the CJS.

THE CENTRE ABROAD

York's archaeological dig at Tel Gath in Israel, under the direction of Professor Carl Ehrlich, completed its second summer in 2000. Registrations for next summer at the site associated with Goliath and the Philistines is now open through the Centre.

In the summer of 2001, the Centre, together with the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York, will sponsor a field-study course on the Holocaust and Anti-Racism in Germany and Poland for future teachers. Students of education are invited to apply through the Centre.

YOU'RE INVITED

31 October – Claude Lanzmann, film, A Visitor From the Living, and discussion with the director. 7:30 p.m., Vari Hall A.

6 May – Leonard Wolinsky Lectures –Louis H. Feldman, Yeshiva University, "Josephus and the Bible". Tessa Rajak, University of Reading, "Josephus and the Diaspora".

2-5 June – Network for Research in Jewish Education Conference.

Associated opens middle school

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With the opening of a new middle school, a new page has been turned in the history of Associated Hebrew Schools.

Some 600 students from Grade 6 to Grade 8 inaugurated the new program at the Danilack Leslie Street campus of the school. Previously, there had been a junior high school, consisting only of grades 7 and 8.

Randy Spiegel, director of development and public relations for Associated, said that the change was made because of a recommendation by the school's educational staff and consultants who had reviewed what is happening in the general education community.

The middle school model, they found, makes "a higher quality education according to age and grade level, and is a better preparation for secondary school," Spiegel said.

Staff and consultants believe there is also more opportunity for youngsters in the preteen years to come together, leading to greater maturity, better discipline and better academic achievement, said Spiegel.

As well, they will have the same principals and teachers over a three-year period, which will lead to more continuity and a better rapport, both of which will be beneficial during what is frequently a difficult period for children, he said.

A new schedule has been organized in which a teacher will teach several subjects within a certain block of time. This will also permit teacher advisory time, he said.

Teachers will be able to offer help and facilitate small group discussions, and provide extra learning time. Besides being academically enriching, Spiegel said, it will allow the students and teachers to "explore and address important personal issues."

Principals are Rabbi Pinchas Brumer and Jerry Rosenfield.

Sam Lipshitz: champion of the Yiddish language

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Obituary

TORONTO — Sam Lipshitz, noted social activist and champion of the Yiddish language, died recently at Sunnybrook Hospital, after suffering a stroke. He was 90.

The day before he had the stroke, Lipshitz put to bed the Rosh Hashanah issue of Fraternally Yours, the newsletter of the New Fraternal Jewish Association, which had broken away from the United Jewish People's Order in 1960. A founder of the association, Lipshitz edited the publication for 40 years.

Sam Lipshitz

A member of the Communist party until 1957, Lipshitz had been editor of the Vochenblatt, a party organ, for 20 years, and at one time its administrator. He was one of the party's stalwarts, travelling across Canada to recruit interest in the movement.

Then Lipshitz went to Moscow with other Canadian Communist party leaders, to find out for himself whether it was true that Jewish writers were being executed under the Soviet regime. When he realized the rumours were true, he broke with the party.

After the break, he became known as a champion of the Jewish left.

He also continued his activities as a writer, editor and Yiddish language champion, and for seven years, in addition to his other activities, was the editor and author of The CJN's Yiddish column.

He remained an active member of the committee for Yiddish of UJA FEDERATION until just before his death.

Lipshitz was born in Radom, Poland, and came to Canada alone at the age of 17, all his family having died in the Holocaust. His first job in Canada was at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal.

His daughter May Cohen, a professor emeritus at McMaster University in Hamilton, recalls that one of her father's favourite stories was of his traditional Jewish wedding at a restaurant in Montreal to Manya, who predeceased him four years ago.

"Apparently someone from the party saw the event, and my father received a stern note from the party's central committee the next day that he must not take part in religious affairs again."

Lipshitz was married to Manya for 66 years.

He was one of the first Canadians to visit Auschwitz and other Nazi death camps in 1945, and his daughter recalls many people coming to her father's apartment seeking news of relatives. "I remember him listening carefully to each name, consulting his notepad, and repeating 'nisht du, nisht du,' (not there) to every request."

At one time, his daughter said, Lipshitz worked as a linotyper in Toronto for $5 a week, and Manya used to take chicken soup to the shop for his lunch. Later, he opened his own business, Trade Typesetting, from which he retired in 1975 to pursue his other interests.

Surviving Lipshitz, in addition to his daughter, are a son, Joseph Lipman of Lafayette, Indiana, a professor of mathematics at Purdue University, five grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

Rosh Hashanah greetings

Holocaust education curricula and materials are being developed and promoted in a number of jurisdictions. CJC, its regions and local federations will continue to cooperate in advancing Holocaust memorialization, education and institutionalization across the country. As a document of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum has put it, we "can help to overcome the worst of human impulses and improve the future."

Poverty among Jews, we regret to note, is as widespread as it is in the general population. The federations are determinedly working not only on mitigating the effects of poverty and eradicating it, but also on tackling many social policy issues confronting our community and society as a whole.

At Canadian Jewish Congress, our responsibility to our federation partners, through our expertise in government and intergroup relations, is to make such social action issues an important part of the national and provincial agendas.

We are equally conscious of the anti-Jewish forces in other parts of the world. Racist attacks in Germany, the bubbling to the surface once again of anti-Semitic forces in Russia, the imprisonment of the Jews in Iran, will be sources of concern for our organization and our community into the foreseeable future.

Finally, the Middle East peace process is at a critical turning point. We wait for the leadership of the Palestinian people to show the necessary flexibility and that they are truly ready to put the past behind them and to live in peace with their Israeli neighbours.

We find ourselves, as often in the past, on the cusp of both hope and fear, optimism and anxiety. In all these areas, experience has taught us that when Jews work together, anything can be achieved. Over the coming year, CJC is committed to continuing its work to build the strength and unity of the Jewish people.

On behalf of the national officers and staff of Canadian Jewish Congress, I wish for the Jewish people, and for each of you, a better world and a peaceful, prosperous and healthy New Year.

Celebrating Rosh Hashanah in Iran

By SHAHNAZ KEYPOUR
Special to The CJN

In Iran, preparations for Rosh Hashanah started with the purchase of a sheep to be slaughtered a few days before the Holy Day. The meat is divided into three parts: one portion goes to the family, one to the neighbours, and one to the poor.

On the day before Rosh Hashanah, I remember that the noise of pots and pans being moved around in the kitchen started very early in the morning as my mother began cooking for the festival. In the early afternoon, when all the cooking was done, we would set the table. In those days we still maintained the tradition of sitting on a carpet to eat our meals.

We would spread out a white tablecloth embroidered with gold thread (a sofreh) in the centre of our colourful Persian carpet. Then we would add the "seder tray" - Iranian Jews have a seder for Rosh Hashanah too, but it is not as long as the Pesach seder. The tray holds six plates of symbolic items: apple and honey, pomegranates, pumpkin and beets, a special herb called tareh, red kidney beans, and a cooked sheep's tongue.

There is no challah in Iran, and the tradition of eating challah is unknown. We always bought our bread and other food items, except for meat, chicken and wine, from Muslim stores. We had our own butchers, and each family used to make its own wine for Shabbat and festivals.

After arranging our seder tray, we would set out the samovar and tea cups. No Iranian ceremony is complete without the samovar and the magic atmosphere it creates in the house.

> No ceremony complete without samovar and the magic atmosphere it creates in the house

Then it was time to go to the most attractive part of the house, our garden which had a rectangular pond with a fountain in the middle, to pick fresh flowers – jasmine; red, white, and yellow roses of the kind that are used to make rose water; and other decorative plants. You can imagine the aroma of these bouquets when they were placed in the middle of the gold-embroidered white sofreh; they added so much to the ambience of the holiday.

Next, the guests, who in our case were always immediate members of our family (my father was the oldest, and it was customary for the younger family members to go to the home of the oldest) arrived. Once everyone was there we welcomed the New Year, wishing each other Shanah Tovah.

The seder started with Kiddush and the blessing over and tasting of every item on the tray. Iranian Jews believe that eating these symbolic foods on Rosh Hashanah influences the heavenly decision to bestow a good new year upon them.

Each item has a significance:

- we dip apples in honey and ask God to usher in a sweet and good year;
- we eat pomegranate so that we may have a multitude of merits;
- we eat cooked pumpkin and beets to symbolize a sweet and colourful, happy year;
- we take a bite into a long grass-like herb called tareh and throw the rest of it behind us so that our adversaries may be eradicated;
- we eat red kidney beans so that we may be fruitful and multiply;
- we eat tongue so that "we will be likened to the head and not to the tail" (a success and not a failure).

Next we say Hamotzi over the bread and dip it in honey, and start eating our festive dinner. This consists of several kinds of rice dishes, stews, and side dishes.

Sweet polow is rice cooked with candied orange peel, pistachios, and almond slivers; another polow is made with raisins and dates; another one with green beans and carrots.

One stew is made with pomegranate, another with quinces, another with fresh herbs and red kidney beans. Tongue is cooked in fresh herbs and spices.

No Persian sofreh is complete without an abundance of sabzi (green herbs), an assortment which includes radishes, scallions, mint, basil, tarragon, and savory. Another side dish is torshi – vegetables or fruits preserved in spices and vinegar.

Dinner is followed by seasonal fruit and Persian tea. Of course joyous conversation flows throughout the evening.

At this time, I would like to wish Geulah for the 10 Iranian Jews jailed on the basis of false accusations in Shiraz.

Shanah Tovah.

Birthright Israel vets become true believers

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Miklos Perlus, 23, is planning to put together a Jewish student film festival. Vanessa Nagley, 20, is becoming an online writer and switched her field of studies to philosophy. Julie Cusmariu, 24, is working in the Jewish community.

Unrelated events? Not really.

In February, all three went to Israel for the first time, as part of Birthright Israel, the project launched last December by philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, the State of Israel and local Jewish communities, to give young people free, 10-day trips to the Jewish State.

Perlus, Nagley and Cusmariu were among the 200 Jewish Montrealers aged 18 to 26 who were picked by lottery (out of 700 local applicants) to go on Birthright Israel's inaugural trip. Another took place in July, with the third planned for next February.

Six months after their return, the trio characterized their current undertakings as a direct legacy of Birthright. All returned, in varying degrees, with a sense of Jewish identity and a feeling of identification with Israel that they said they never would have imagined or predicted. The word "awesome" comes up often when they talk about the trip.

"My worst fears were realized," jokes Perlus, a Toronto native who says he might have had a "theoretical attachment" to Israel, but never had any notion of actually going there.

Why not? He wanted to avoid becoming exactly what he fears he has become: one of those young people who returns from Israel awestruck and insistent on telling people who've never been there to go, go, go.

"No one in my family has ever been there and Israel was only an additional problem I didn't need," Perlus says.

The "volatile political situation" was his reliable excuse, but a persistent friend finally goaded him into applying.

"Now I feel like I've joined the club," he says. He's now after his parents, brother and sister to go, too.

The trip also motivated him to begin planning a Jewish student film festival.

"It was a profound experience. It brought about a new perception of Judaism, and not just a religion but a culture. That the Bible was not just a religious book, but history."

Now, he says, when he meets someone, "I say, 'Hi, I'm Mik. Have you been to Israel?' "

For Nagley, the Birthright Israel trip was a similar turning point.

Saying she was "never really interested" in Israel, Nagley, who had not attended Jewish schools, applied when a friend urged her to and because it was a "free trip."

Once there, however, Nagley discovered a part of herself she had not previously been aware of: the writer part of herself. She wrote letters and kept a journal, and when she returned, she switched from studies in mechanical engineering to philosophy.

Right now she's in the process of setting up her own Web site – inthefold.net – in which she hopes to launch a career as an opinionated observer of the Jewish community and other issues.

Nagley has taken some Hebrew courses, has attended some synagogue services and attended a "late night Torah society" as part of her research.

"I would definitely like to go back [to Israel]," she says, "but I'm not sure yet in what capacity. I came back pretty much Jewish."

Of the three, Cusmariu was previously the most knowledgeable about the Jewish community, although not involved.

A Bialik High School graduate, Cusmariu had also avoided going to Israel because she didn't feel like "jumping on the bandwagon," even though "I knew I would have to go one day."

At the urging of a good friend at Hillel, she finally relented, ended up staying weeks longer in Israel, travelled though Europe, and returned much "less afraid to identify myself with the Jewish community."

Cusmariu eventually found herself applying for a job at the Bronfman Israeli Experience offices at FEDERATION CJA, which runs Birthright, and became the project's "follow-up co-ordinator." She went on the second Birthright trip last July, this time as an employee.

Working for the Jewish community was something Cusmariu says she would never have imagined.

"I really don't know what I'd be doing if I hadn't gone on that trip," she now says. "I wake up each day and ask myself: 'Am I really doing this?' "

Applications for the February 2000 Birthright Israel trip are being accepted until Oct. 4, and are being accepted online only, at www.israelforfree.com.

Chassidic organization convicted of tax evasion

CJN News Services

MONTREAL — A charitable organization managed by members of the chassidic Tash community in Boisbriand has been convicted of tax evasion after pleading guilty to a $60-million fraud scheme.

The organization, Construit Toujours Avec Bonté, was fined $400,000 at the St. Jérôme courthouse, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency (CCRA) announced.

A two-year CCRA investigation revealed that the organization issued and sold false charity donation receipts and phony bills for amounts equal to 20 percent of their real value, according to a press release.

"This scheme enabled individuals or companies to fraudulently reduce their tax payable. The CCRA's investigation is not yet complete, as donor files have yet to be examined and tax fraud charges could be laid," it was stated.

Both Construit Toujours Avec Bonté and the community's Montreal Rabbinical College, also known as Oir Hachaim d'Tash, have had their right to issue tax receipts revoked.

People and businesses whose names appear on the phony receipts will be reassessed shortly, and may face criminal charges, according to Gaétan Ouellette of the CCRA's investigation division.

Donors were given tax receipts for 80 percent more than the amount they actually gave the organization. The donor could then deduct the inflated amount from his provincial and federal income taxes. With receipts totalling $60 million, the charitable organization would have netted $12 million.

The Montreal Rabbinical College issued a brief statement, through a public relations firm, "clarifying" the connection between it and Construit Toujours Avec Bonté.

It says the College has "not been charged with any offence under the income tax act.

"Contrary to the (CCRA) press release, the Rabbinical College has been informed by CCRA that there is no ongoing investigation into the affairs of the Rabbinical College or any of its donors.

"The right of the Rabbinical College to issue charitable donation receipts is not affected by the plea entered into by Construit Toujours Avec Bonté.

"It is regrettable that the press release incorrectly connected the Rabbinical College with [that organization). The Rabbinical College will continue to carry on its educational and charitable activities."

Ouellette, however, confirmed that the press release was correct and donors will be investigated.

Tash's college should not be confused with Lubavitch's Rabbinical College of Canada in Montreal. Tash is a highly reclusive sect living in Boisbriand, 60 kilometres north of Montreal, under the leadership of Chief Rabbi F. Lowy.

B'nai Brith Canada League for Human Rights national chair Stephen Scheinberg said he hoped the scandal would not cast a shadow on the entire Jewish community.

He denounced the scam as "the rather ugly criminal acts of a small group" in the Tash community, but warned against inferring that this practice is widespread in the Jewish community.

"A story of this nature risks casting a very negative shadow over Quebec's entire Jewish community and can unjustly nourish intolerant stereotypes," he said.

The League's Quebec chair, lawyer Allan Adel, added: "B'nai Brith certainly supports a full investigation of the affair and prosecutions and penalties, if called for.

"At the same time, we would caution all of the media not to make careless estimates of the extent of the scandal until charges have been laid, prosecutions carried out, and penalties levied. Until then, conjectures about the extent of the scandal are without foundation and harmful to the entire Jewish community."

The League was critical of the Gazette for reporting quotes from the man who exposed the scam, Joseph Gutstadt, president of Magil Construction International.

"Mr. Gutstadt's views of fund-raising by Orthodox Jews are uninformed and vicious."

The CCRA appears to be highlighting this case as a warning to other charitable organizations.

"People and organizations that deliberately cheat on their taxes are not just defrauding the CCRA, they are forcing honest Canadians to pay more than their fair share. To guarantee the tax system remains fair, the CCRA will prosecute individuals and organizations that evade tax."

CJA campaign off to quick start

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg's annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign is off to a tremendous start.

Gerry Koffman, the CJA's executive director, reports that as of Sept. 21, the campaign had raised $1,170,138 on 1,664 pledges. Last year at the same time, he notes, the campaign had only raised $559,000.

The goal this year is $3,420,000, up from $3,353,000 raised last year.

For the second year in a row, the campaign team went on a five-day telephone blitz, from Sept. 10 to 14, rather than one specific "Super Sunday" blitz.

"On Super Sunday, we were always putting all our eggs in one basket," says Koffman. "We found by stretching it over a week that we are able to reach more people."

For Koffman, the highlight of Super Week was the involvement of the beneficiary organizations in helping with canvassing, and especially the help of several BBYO members.

"It was really great seeing the passion and enthusiasm of the young BBYO volunteers," he says. "In one 90-minute shift, they secured 200 pledges."

This year, canvassers tried to encourage all donors to consider increasing the size of their gifts by a small amount and, Koffman says, a very large percentage did.

"We successfully made our case that we need more money for unmet needs in the community and needy Jewish communities abroad," he says.

Que. urged to boost immigration levels

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish community leaders recently called on the Quebec government to allow more immigrants to come to Quebec, and to provide more money for their integration over the next few years.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), and the Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS) made their joint position clear last month in a brief presented at hearings held by the National Assembly's Commission on Culture in Quebec City.

"These last years, the Quebec government immigration levels have been lower than those of the early 1990s," the joint brief reads.

During the 1990s, Quebec admitted more than 350,000 immigrants, with the average number dropping over the last several years.

"Since immigration policies have to be drafted with Quebec's long-term interests in mind, the current demographic situation suggests that increased immigration is necessary to ensure Quebec's economic, cultural and social future," CJC-Q and JIAS say.

The brief serves as the Jewish community's reaction to the immigration ministry's triennial discussion paper that this year suggested four options concerning immigration levels for the next three years. The options suggested would allow levels ranging from about 68,000 immigrants next year to nearly 100,000 by 2003.

The brief does not specify exactly what type of levels the Jewish community would support. But it strongly criticizes the way the fourth option – of welcoming almost 100,000 immigrants – is dismissed outright by the ministry as a possibility.

Letting in that many immigrants, said immigration minister Robert Perreault, would trigger an "abrupt transformation of the demographic dynamic" and "demand an in-depth reappraisal of the social consensus in determining the capacity to welcome and to successfully integrate new arrivals."

In reaction, the brief calls the minister's comments "unacceptable."

"In using that type of language, we believe the minister is trying to erode the social consensus that currently exists," the brief says.

"In addressing the four scenarios, it's important to recognize that more than the important cultural and social contributions immigrants make to Quebec society, the province also makes sizable economic gains from immigration."

The brief comprehensively addresses a wide range of immigration and refugee-related issues. On the issue of "independent" immigrants, for example, the brief recognizes the benefits to the province of an immigrant who has an existing knowledge of French.

But is also notes that "the linguistic integration of immigrants whose mother tongue is not French has proven to be a success."

Moreover, even for francophone immigrants, successful integration into Quebec society is not guaranteed, the brief says, since successful integration is defined by more than language skills.

More should be done to help francophone immigrants integrate, and more recognition be given to an immigrant's professional skills in the immigrant selection process, the brief urges.

It also recommends that Quebec bring in francophone immigrants from non-traditional countries of origin, not just from the usual ones such as France or those in North Africa.

On the issue of refugees, the brief praises Quebec for having absorbed more than 60,000 refugees during the 1990s. But it also urges the province to be "flexible" in terms of the numbers it allows in the future.

CJC, JIAS present brief

Last decade, the brief notes, Quebec took in 2,300 of 7,300 people granted refugee status by the federal government, representing a disproportionately high percentage and reflecting the province's "humanitarian commitment."

But it also urges Quebec to lobby Ottawa to let more refugees in. Although the total number of refugees taken in by Quebec increased from about 7,400 between 1990 and 1994, to 10,000 in the years 1995 to 1999, the number of refugees sponsored through the private sector, CJC-Q and JIAS note, fell drastically over that same period, from 4,200 to about 1,100.

The brief laments the fact that the immigration ministry's discussion paper doesn't even refer to private sector sponsorship programs and makes no distinction between refugees under the sponsorship of the government and those sponsored by the private sector.

The public should be more aware of such private sponsorship programs, and the government should establish concrete levels of refugees who could come in under private sponsorship, the brief says.

As well, more government funds should be allocated for refugee centres worldwide, the brief says, and in its authors' view, refugees choosing to live in urban centres such as Montreal – as the vast majority do – does not "constitute a demographic, linguistic or socio-cultural problem."

On the issue of family reunification, the brief also urges the government to broaden its definition of "family," which currently excludes siblings and married children. They should be included, the brief says, as should the age limit for "dependent children," which is currently 18.

Within the Jewish community, the brief notes, aged parents left behind in the former Soviet Union do not meet Quebec's current criteria for admission.

A raucous first week in Parliament

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

We were promised a raucous opening week of Parliament and none of the parties in the House of Commons disappointed!

Since we have had occasion to bash the Right Honourable leader of the Progressive (on social policy) Conservatives (on fiscal policy) so often in the past, we can at least give him his due for coming up with the best line of the week. In welcoming him back to the House, the Prime Minister observed that when Joe Clark first came to Ottawa as an opposition MP, he served as Chrétien's opposition critic. In response, Clark retorted that serving as the prime minister's critic was not an especially onerous task – then or now... Touché!

For his opening gambit, Stockwell Day has left the Parliamentary Press Gallery in a tizzy. Not accepting to play by the rules, Day has refused to participate in post question period scrums. As a result, his sound bites are much more controlled and the media are caught in a dilemma of either covering his daily press conferences or hanging out in the lobby hoping for a bon mot from one of the other principals. Given that Day is the man to watch, there is a lot of pressure to get his take on the daily events of the House.

The media are not the only ones to have come to that conclusion. Readers should be aware of the important shift in the government's thinking on the issue of Stockwell Day, the Canadian Alliance and the other parties challenging the Liberals.

Conventional wisdom had the Liberals preferring a continuing presence of the Tories in federal politics to the extent that the Grits occasionally helped prop them up. The theory was that a semi-dynamic Tory presence would help split the right-wing vote and allow the Liberals to come up the middle.

That strategy has changed and helps explain why Chrétien was willing to provide Price and St. Jacques with the knife to stab Joe Clark on the day of his by-election victory. Now the calculus is that the Tories muddy the water. The Liberals want Canadians to be faced with a stark and absolute choice: Reform reactionaries in sheep's clothing or the Liberal government that has a tent wide enough to render red and pink Tories irrelevant on the one side and New Democrats equally marginal on the other.

It amounts to a powerful piece of political manipulation. One that substantially reduces the choices that will be available to Canadians in the next general election.

Jewish woman celebrates holidays in small-town British Columbia

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

KLUCULZ LAKE, B.C. — The balancing act between Rosh Hashanah's spiritual renewal in the synagogue and family festivities can be difficult to achieve for many Jews. While the New Year is meant to be both serious and festive, striking the perfect equilibrium of prayer and deep personal reflection; of spending time and enjoying sumptuous meals with friends and family is not always an easy matter.

For the past eight years, since she moved from Portland, Oregon, Georgene Powell has not found herself in this situation. The only Jewish resident in her tiny northern B.C. town, Powell is hundreds of miles away from the nearest synagogue and Jew. Located halfway between Prince George and Vanderhoof, Powell's home in Kluculz Lake - population 300 - becomes her synagogue, her community, and her kosher vegetarian deli during Rosh Hashanah.

> 'Being alone allows me to dig a little deeper'

"It's something I do on my own," Powell said about the New Year's festivities and responsibilities, speaking on the telephone from her home.

"It's a self-reflective holiday mostly. I do go through the prayers and the Torah portions and all that, but it's mainly a time of introspection. I'm going to make special dinners like I normally do, but this year's a little different because I'll allow my husband to eat with me as well."

Married to a non-Jew, Powell offers a two-fold explanation as to why her husband will now be joining her during Rosh Hashanah suppertime.

"First, he's usually in bed very early and, second, I'm starting to involve him a little more with me in these kinds of things," she says. "He hasn't been that interested in the past which used to bother me in the beginning but not anymore."

Powell says her community is very important to her, despite being in such an isolated one as Kluculz Lake. She's also inviting a close friend to her home to share in her Rosh Hashanah feast.

"She's very Jewish-friendly so I've asked her to join me for dinner. This, for me, has to do with the support and sharing of Jewish festivals and the Shabbat – and who says I can't share with a non-Jew?"

Vancouver Rabbi Hillel Goelman believes Powell's decision to create a celebration that is relevant to her own life in small-town B.C. and share the High Holy Days with non-Jews are laudable goals.

But while he admires Powell and other isolated Jews for their attempts to celebrate away from a Jewish community, he believes they would get a whole lot more out of Rosh Hashanah by joining in with a larger Jewish community.

"All 600,000 of us were assembled at Mt. Sinai together to hear the Torah, and we must remember that Torah has to be acquired in community," says Rabbi Goelman.

"One of the chassidic teachers I've just read sets out two main components to Rosh Hashanah. The first is the communal aspect, where we hear the shofar together and feed off each other.

"The other is being alone with God. I think those are two very important aspects that share equal significance," he says.

While Powell says she would enjoy living closer to where she could hear the shofar, visit the synagogue and enjoy a true kosher meal, a Vancouver visit was not possible this month.

"I'm making do with what I've got up here. Being alone always allows me to dig a little deeper to see what changes I can make in my life on a spiritual level," she says.

"But I also realize how important and wonderful it would be to share in a larger community, and next year I'll again try getting down."

five years, working to develop international co-operation and aid, was very rewarding. "It was one of those assignments where you see the results of your work and you see that your programs can be relevant and effective, where you are welcome wherever you go."

Looking ahead to his assignment in Canada, Divon is enthusiastic. "I am extremely excited to be here now and to be able to keep developing the excellent relations which our two countries enjoy," he says.

"Also, to learn a lot from Canada on the global issues which it initiates and leads. Of course, I look forward to working closely with the Jewish community, which I have already noticed is very well organized and developed."

Canada is a role model on the global stage, Divon suggests. "Canada is recognized as one of the leaders of the free world, number 1 in quality of life. [I will be able] to see and to learn how you have been able to achieve this, in terms of tolerance, the multi-ethnic society which lives so well," he says.

"The economy is one area I would like to emphasize – trade and culture are very important."

While in Ottawa, Divon would like to emphasize aspects of Israel other than conflict. "Canada is also playing a very important role in the peace process, and I hope it will continue to play a major role," he says.

"There are many items on the agenda, and I will make sure my hands will be full. I am looking forward to an enjoyable and fruitful stay here in Ottawa."

Indulge your sweet tooth at Rosh Hashanah

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

While the celebration of holidays and festivals throughout the year affords Jewish people plenty of opportunity to enjoy desserts and treats, Rosh Hashanah is the designated time in the Jewish calendar to indulge the sweet tooth.

Honey, which symbolizes sweetness, is one of the traditional foods we eat on Rosh Hashanah in hope that the new year will be a sweet one. And so it is customary in both the Ashkenazi and Sephardi traditions to dip bread into honey – or in sugar in some Sephardi practices – after the Hamotzi is said. Fruit is also dipped in honey before the festive meal begins. Over the years, this practice of eating sugar and honey has evolved to include desserts made with honey.

The Ashkenazim incorporated into the Rosh Hashanah culinary tradition honey cake, a dessert that was an adaptation of the Polish honey cake, pierniki luckie, says food historian Thelma Barer-Stein, author of You Are What You Eat.

She notes that honey is one of the oldest known sweeteners. Desserts made with "honey syrups date back to Alexander the Great."

The co-author of To Life, Barer-Stein, who grew up in Vancouver, recalls eating honey cake on Rosh Hashanah. Although her family originated from Austria, she says the Austro-Hungarian Empire encompassed parts of Poland, and honey cake was eventually incorporated into the Austrian diet.

On Rosh Hashanah her family also ate "a delicious honey nut candy" called makagigi, which can also be traced back to Poland, she adds. The recipe, which is not in either book is included below.

While not a serious baker, Torontonian Erin Field-Roher has a reputation among her friends for baking one of the best honey cakes anywhere. She makes about 20 small loaves, wraps them in plastic wrap and cellophane, and gives them to friends and family at Rosh Hashanah.

Field-Roher is quick to give the originator of this recipe her due. "I got it from my friend Nadine Charendoff, whose mother-in-law Evelyn Charendoff gave her the recipe.

"Nadine made me one for Rosh Hashanah. Traditional honey cake sometimes is [heavy] like a brick. This one is so light and delicious. People who don't [usually] like honey cake love it."

She says the secret ingredient is the baby food.

Food writer Norene Gilletz, author MealLeaniYumm, says home-made honey cake was a tradition in her family. She grew up in Winnipeg, where her mother made honey cake with buckwheat honey. Gilletz says that nuts are often not used in honey cake at New Years because nuts, especially walnuts can be bitter.

EVELYN CHARENDOFF'S HONEY CAKE RECIPE

1 cup sugar
1½ cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup vegetable oil
2 4-oz. jars of strained baby carrots
2 eggs
2 heaping tbsp. buckwheat honey

Grease a regular size loaf pan 9 x 5 x 3. Mix together all wet and dry ingredients. Pour batter into greased pan.

Bake at 350 for 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Let cake cool before removing from pan. For small loaf pans – this recipe fills two small loaf pans – bake for 55 minutes.

New medication helps Crohn's disease sufferers

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a researcher and physician trained in scientific discipline, Dr. Hillary Steinhart chooses his words carefully. He's not prone to hyperbole so as far as he's concerned, Infliximab represents " a significant advance" in the treatment of Inflammatory Bowel Disease (IBD).

Felisia Ali, on the other hand, is not limited by the requirements of scientific detachment. A Crohn's patient who's experienced the agony of constant stomach pain and the restricted lifestyle the disease imposes, she has a different take on her medication. From her perspective, Infliximab is nothing less than "a miracle drug."

They may both be right.

As staff gastroenterologist at Mt. Sinai Hospital and a leading expert on IBD, Steinhart is on the leading edge of research into Crohn's treatment. Ali is one of Steinhart's patients and someone who has suffered from Crohn's disease, an inflammation of the digestive system.

Two years ago, Ali was in awful shape. She often suffered from severe stomach pain accompanied by nausea and diarrhea. In a two-month span, her weight dropped from 140 pounds to 79 pounds. Surgery was prescribed and doctors removed about a foot of her small intestine and a couple of inches of her large bowel, then reattached the two.

The treatment worked for about one month before recurring intestinal pain led her doctor at the time to prescribe Prednisone, an anti-inflammatory steroid that is commonly used in treating patients with Crohn's. Though it boasts a high success rate, the drug exacts a high price from long-term users. Prednisone's side effects include moon face, acne, weight gain, emotional changes, cataract formation and osteoporosis.

When Ali first met Steinhart in early to mid 1999, the doctor suggested she try Infliximab, a new medication in use in the United States which was still awaiting regulatory approval in Canada. Felisia jumped at the opportunity and in July, received her first infusion. "I felt good right away," she said.

Within a short time, her Crohn's symptoms began to disappear and what's more, she did not suffer from significant side affects.

Infliximab, sold under the trade name Remicade, "is the first of a new class of Biologics drugs, biologic response modifiers," Steinhart said. "The drug is an antibody directed against a protein, TNF Alpha, which is considered central to inflammation."

By blocking the activity of TNF Alpha, inflammation and other symptoms of Crohn's are stymied. International tests show that 50 to 80 percent of patients improve with treatment. Half of those with abdominal pains and diarrhea are in remission four weeks after treatment, while 30 percent show significant improvement, he said.

Furthermore, Infliximab has been shown to close fistulas, connections between the bowel and the skin. "This is the only drug effective in allowing healing" of fistulas, Steinhart said.

In a little over a year, Steinhart has prescribed Infliximab to more than 30 patients, most of whom have severe forms of Crohn's. Treatment consists of a two-hour intravenous infusion every eight weeks. There are some side affects from the infusion, including slight fever, shortness of breath and a fall of blood pressure, but these can be readily treated, Steinhart said.

The side affects in some people results when they develop antibodies to the antibodies in the infusion, since Infliximab contains mouse proteins, he added.

Infliximab "is not a cure, but it's a major advance," Steinhart said. Patients will likely need regular treatment into the foreseeable future.

Developed by Centocor, a U.S. company that was swallowed by chemical giant Johnson & Johnson, Infliximab is marketed in Canada by Schering Canada.

Although the cause of Crohn's is not certain, it is believed the disease results from an immune system that is out of whack. "Some individuals have an over-active immune system that's triggered by external factors, such as diet, smoking, medication, infections, bowel bacteria," Steinhart said. The immune system has "gas and brakes... For people with Crohn's Disease, the brakes are not operating properly."

There are about 60 biologics in the pipeline aimed at treating IBD, he added.

While Infliximab may be the first wave of a future response to disease, it comes with a hefty price tag. The full price for a single treatment varies between $3,000 and $5,000, or $18,000 to $30,000 per year.

Because it has yet to receive regulatory approval in Canada, it is available only through a special access program and the cost of the drug is often subsidized, Steinhart said.

Ali is one of the patients who has benefited from the subsidy program. She paid for her first dose but received the next two at no cost under the program.

For her, the drug was a godsend. "Before, I was in pain, rolling around and crying. There was nothing I could do about it."

Now she said, her life has returned to normal. She's enrolled in college and she can do the things healthy people take for granted, like going to movies and joining her family for outings.

"You don't feel so out of place any more," she said.

Israel presses for UN role on Temple Mount

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel is pushing an initiative to hand sovereignty of the Temple Mount to permanent members of the UN Security Council in the latest effort to break through to a final status agreement with the Palestinians.

Among those involved are the governments of the United States and Egypt, who proposed the idea, French President Jacques Chirac, and UN Secretary General Kofi Annan.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak asked the French President to participate in this effort because of France's position as current president of the European Union and as permanent member of the Security Council.

Another unspoken reason for requesting the French role is that, unlike the United States, Paris would not be "suspected" of favouring Israel.

During a long telephone conversation recently with the French President, Barak explained that the Temple Mount issue was preventing the achievement of a final status agreement with the Palestinians.

Barak also emphasized that the problem involved the unwillingness of the Palestinians and the Muslim world to recognize the special claim the Jewish people historically have on the Temple Mount.

Barak said that while the Western Wall is considered holy for Jews, Muslims are unwilling to recognize the rights of Jews and Israel to the site, and will merely concede their right to pray there.

As a result, Barak said, Israel rejects Palestinian chairman Yasser Arafat's claim for Palestinian or Muslim sovereignty over the Temple Mount. The prime minister told Chirac that in any future arrangement, the status quo over the holy sites would be preserved, and the Temple Mount would remain in the hands of the Jerusalem Wakf (Muslim religious authority).

Israel now believes bringing the Temple Mount under the aegis of the international community could be the best way to safeguard the rights and interests of both faiths, while retaining the status quo on the ground.

The French president expressed his willingness to help and said the French government co-ordinates its positions on the peace process with Washington.

Chirac and Israel's acting Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami met last week for what appeared to be talks focused on the idea of international sovereignty over the Temple Mount. The next day Chirac spoke with Arafat and Annan on the telephone.

The idea of international sovereignty over the Temple Mount was first raised by U.S. President Bill Clinton during the latter part of the Camp David Summit in July as one of several possible options to solve the question of Jerusalem. Egypt later presented an updated version of the idea, placing control in the hands of the Security Council's five permanent members.

Responding to the reports, the Prime Minister's Office said "this is all speculation. Barak is not willing to discuss the proposal until Arafat agrees to discuss it."

In Israel and in the Palestinian Authority, officials are waiting to see what President Clinton's next steps in the peace process might be, and it is still not clear if the U.S. will present the sides with a bridging document.

Syrian missile test worries IDF

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syria successfully tested its first North Korean ground-to-ground Scud-D missile early last Saturday morning – the missile was fired toward northeastern Syria.

Reliable defence sources said the military establishment was somewhat surprised by the model of missile fired.

The sources said the Israel Defence Force's Arrow missile can intercept the Scud-D, which has a maximum range of about 600 kilometres – a longer reach than earlier Scud B and C models, but shorter than the new Iranian Shihab 3, and the North Korean missile on which it is based, the No-Dong.

The difficulty the Scud-D would pose for the IDF lies in trying to locate the missile launchers. Extending the range enables the Syrian military to locate launchers deep inside their territory and operate them at a far greater distance than with previous short-range missiles.

The Scud-D missile threat will force the Israel Air Force to invest considerable effort in locating and destroying the missiles – like its efforts against the Iraqi Al-Abas and Al-Hussein missiles, both of which belong to the Scud family.

Like the earlier models, the Scud-D is capable of being armed with chemical and biological warheads manufactured in Syria. It is not known exactly what sort of warhead the missile launched on Saturday was testing.

The military establishment commented that the Scud-D test, along with reports of a number of No-Dong missiles being supplied to Libya, and the continued development of the Shihab 3, proves the IAF has been correct in building up its strength in recent years.

In internal discussions, air force commanders argued that the air force must equip itself with a sufficient number of advanced jets to be able to act against the launchers of ground-to-ground missiles of short, medium and long ranges.

Yehuda Amichai, the people's poet, laid to rest

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Obituary

JERUSALEM — Politicians, generals, poets, writers, singers, professors of literature and many other devoted fans of Yehuda Amichai came Sunday afternoon to a sun-drenched Safra Square at Jerusalem's City Hall to pay their last respects to Israel's unofficial poet laureate, who died of cancer last Friday at the age of 76.

Amichai was one of the leading Israeli poets of the 20th century. He was born in Germany to a religious family of farmers who came to Palestine in 1936 and eventually moved to Jerusalem. He volunteered for the Jewish Brigade in the British Army during World War II, and later, as a member of the Palmach underground forces, he participated in gun-running and helping to bring Jewish immigrants to Palestine. During the War of Independence in 1948, he fought in the Negev.

Amichai studied literature and biblical studies at Hebrew University, Jerusalem, graduating in 1956. To earn a living while writing poetry, he taught at a secondary school for many years. He subsequently lectured at the Hebrew University and New York University.

In 1982, he was awarded the Israel Prize for Hebrew Literature and the Bialik Prize. In 1990, he received an honorary PhD from Hebrew University.

Amichai began publishing his poetry in the 1940s and his first collection, Achshav u be'yamim ha'acherim (Now and in the other days), came out in 1955.

His poetry was modern, in both language and substance, intertwining prosaic elements of everyday life and emphasizing his belief that modern poetry should deal with current, daily themes. Amichai made use of technological terms, tanks, airplanes and fuel, and he wrote about rental agreements.

He was also an innovator of language, using biblical Hebrew, the Hebrew of the Middle Ages and contemporary slang. Amichai was known as a poet who wrote in a language that was accessible.

He once said that when he served in the army, he learned that there are two things – love and war – that "must coexist." This theme is clearly evident in his heart-wrenching poems, such as Shneinu be'yachad ve kol echad lechud (The two of us together and each one separately), Geshem be'sdeh ha'krav (Rain on the battlefield), Shir leil Shabbat (A song for the Sabbath eve) and others.

However, his poetry is also full of irony that he directed at himself, standing alone in his own environment. Thus, Jerusalem was a favourite subject. In an interview he gave to the Boston Globe some two months ago, he said he had walked through every alley of the city and that peace would emerge from one of them.

Yehuda Amichai

Amichai published 16 poetry anthologies, as well as children's songs, two novels, a collection of short stories, two plays and numerous essays. His poetry was translated into 33 languages and he was considered a leading candidate for a Nobel Prize in literature.

Avraham Burg called Amichai "the foundation stone of Israeliness" and concluded his remarks by saying, "I want to take my leave of you in the name of a religious individual who found roads to God through you."

Writer Meir Shalev said Amichai's language was not as simple as it sometimes appeared to be, but multi-layered, and Amichai simply allowed everyday Hebrew to walk in the palaces of poetry.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak called Amichai "the person whose words gave meaning to our life here." Barak said Amichai's poetry "prepared the nation's hearts for the great act of conciliation of this generation – the recognition between us and our neighbours."

Of Amichai's relationship with Jerusalem, Barak said, "This city of Amichai's is a city in which reconciliation is possible, in which it is possible to achieve the impossible."

Amichai is survived by his wife Hannah and three children, Ron, David and Emanuella.

Illegal child labour exceeds 20,000

By HAIM BIOR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — More than 20,000 children are working in violation of child labour laws, according to Adi Ben-Ami, head of the Noar Ha'Oved V'Halomed youth movement.

The figure is far more than estimated by the Central Bureau of Statistics, said Ben-Ami, who presented the data Sunday at a weekly session of the Histadrut Labour Federation leadership, and about five times a figure recently published by CBS, which stated that 4,181 children were illegally employed in 1998, as compared to 628 in 1994.

The Histadrut discussed the issue of illegal child labour after nine Palestinians, aged nine to 14, were found recently along the Jerusalem-to-Tel Aviv highway, near Latrun, abandoned without food and water after having worked on a farm for one week straight.

Ben-Ami wants the youth movement to be granted power to try to deal with the problem of child labour in agriculture, building and in open markets. He argued the movement should be empowered to act because the Labour and Social Affairs ministry has found it difficult to deal efficiently with the issue.

Jihad Akal, head of the Hadash Party faction in the Histadrut, said the number of school dropouts in the Arab sector was about 44 percent by the 12th grade, and half that figure dropped out of school by the time they reached age 13. This compared to a dropout rate of only 12 percent in the Jewish sector, with just six percent dropping out by age 13.

"These figures explain how a situation is created in which children get into the labour market at much too young an age and work as delivery boys, haulers and cleaners under horrendous conditions that endanger them and others," said Akal.

The Histadrut called on local authorities and regional councils to take action against child exploitation, which they said has increased recently. They said this has been clearly evident in the increasing number of children that have been spotted at major intersections selling drinks and snacks.

The week in Israel

Sept. 18

• A Likud legislator called upon Prime Minister Ehud Barak to demand the U.S. recall its ambassador to Israel. Uzi Landau issued the call after U.S. envoy Martin Indyk called for the sharing of Jerusalem last week. "It is inconceivable that an ambassador should call for the partition of the capital in which he is serving," Landau said.

• Israel awarded honorary citizenship to Per Anger, now 88, who, as a Swedish diplomat during World War II, shielded thousands of Hungarian Jews from the Nazis.

Sept. 19

• Foreign workers toiling in an orchard near Israel's border with Lebanon were pelted with stones thrown from the other side. A shot was also fired from the Lebanese side. No injuries were reported.

Sept. 20

• Israelis top the list of foreign investors snapping up real estate at bargain prices in Budapest, according to Reuters.

• Tel Aviv launched the city's first bicycle paths. The paths run along the city's busy main boulevards.

Sept.21

• Israel and the Palestinian Authority signed an agreement authorizing the construction of a sea port in Gaza, Ha'aretz reported.

Sept.22

• A serial rapist is thought to be responsible for at least three rapes and a sexual assault at an IDF army base in the centre of the country. Army and police investigators did not inform the pubic until today for fear of harming their investigation.

Community condemns Iran appeals court verdicts

JTA and CJN Wire Services

It might appear that Iran made concessions by reducing jail time for the "Iran 10," but Canadian Jewish advocates insist it's not nearly enough.

Decrying the verdict of the appeals court announced in Iran last Thursday, activists vowed that the fate of the prisoners will not be forgotten.

In Ottawa, Liberal MP and international human rights advocate Irwin Cotler rose in the House of Commons to decry the ruling of the appeals court.

Cotler, who has been involved in the case for 18 months, acknowledged that the charges of spying for Israel had been dropped and the prison terms reduced.

"But this is little solace for those who were unjustly charged to begin with, who were deprived of every canon of a right to a fair trial, and who continue to be subjected to the prosecution and persecution of the innocent," Cotler said.

The appeals decision reduces the jail time of the most severely punished, Hamid Tefileen, to nine years from 13, and the shortest sentence, for Ramin Nemati Zadeh, to two years from four.

Iranian judiciary officials said time served will be included in the sentences.

"We totally reject the decision of the Iranian appeals court to maintain the sentences meted out to the 10 Iranian Jews," stated Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen. "Even though the time served will be reduced, this outcome is still the product of a flawed judicial process that has remained biased and is not consistent with international norms of justice," Ronen added.

"The accused are innocent of the charges and have now been in detention for 18 months. Along with human rights activists around the world, we will continue to raise our voices on behalf of these prisoners."

Ronen called for the prisoners' immediate release. As well, CJC urges ongoing advocacy, including appeals to Iran's supreme court and to the country's leaders for clemency.

Congress called on Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to publicly condemn the decision and to freeze ongoing initiatives with Iran.

CJC is also urging rabbis across Canada to come together in public places and sound the ram's horn in a call for the release of the prisoners and in an expression of solidarity with them.

The 10 Iranian Jews were convicted in July of various charges, including spying for Israel, despite the fact that no official charges of any kind were made public or disclosed to the accused until after the trial.

"The effect," Cotler said, "was to deny the accused the basic right to know and the right to make full answer and reply to the charges.

"Moreover, statements made by Iranian prosecutors during the trial raise concerns about religion as an improper motivation for the prosecution of the Iranian Jews."

New sentences for Iranian 10

The following are the new sentences handed out last week for the "Iran 10":

- Hamid Tefileen, 29, reduced to nine years in prison.
- Ramin Farzam, 36, eight years.
- Nasser Levi Haim, 46, seven years.
- Asher Zadmehr, 49, seven years.
- Javeed Beit Yakov, 41, six years.
- Farzad Kashi, 31, six years.
- Farhad Saleh, 31, six years.
- Shahrokh Paknahad, 23, five years.
- Faramarz Kashi (brother of Farzad Kashi), 35, three years.
- Ramin Nemati, 23, two years.

Israeli, Egyptian officers meet in U.S. in bid to foster dialogue

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The United States is organizing meetings between Israeli and Egyptian army officers in an attempt to foster a dialogue between the defence establishments of the two countries and reduce tensions and mutual anxieties.

Five officers from each country took part in a meeting held recently at a U.S. military base in Virginia. For the first time, the Egyptians also sent a senior officer, bearing the rank of brigadier-general, who does not belong to the liaison unit of the Egyptian Army that maintains ongoing working relations with the IDF.

At the Virginia meeting, the officers from the two countries took part in simulation exercises, based on various scenarios for the Middle East, under the guidance of their American hosts. According to Israeli sources, the meeting was more successful than its predecessors, which mainly produced frustration.

"We hope this marks the beginning of a new road, but there is still a long way to go," said one of the sources.

The administration believes that by creating ties between the defence establishments, it will be possible to promote the normalization process between Egypt and Israel – Washington's two major allies in the region – and forestall allegations, such as the one made by Israel, that Egypt is engaged in an intensive military buildup and poses a threat.

The idea for the meetings was advanced by U.S. Defence Secretary William Cohen in a meeting with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Another ardent supporter of the project is the U.S. ambassador to Israel, Martin Indyk, who tried to implement it when he served as assistant secretary of state for the Middle East.

Mubarak has consistently prevented the development of security ties between the IDF and the Egyptian Army and between the two defence ministries. The Egyptian leader has also limited security relations to the continuing co-ordination that takes place via the military liaison committee, which deals mainly with guarding the border.

The latest meeting of that committee took place two weeks ago in Egypt. No special problems were raised and the Israeli side described the meeting as a success.

Demographic study sparks debate

By GAYLE HORWITZ
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — A recent study which projects the shape of the world Jewish community through 2080 has touched off debate among some demographers who question the value of reaching so far into the future.

"Long-term projections from demographers have the same accuracy as economists today predicting the economy 80 years from now," said Gary Tobin, president of the San Francisco-based Institute for Jewish and Community Research.

Because projections are made on the presumption that present conditions will not change, their conclusions have "no value," he said.

"We cannot predict significant changes over time," he added. "Their only value is in examining where we are at in the present."

The findings of a team of scholars from Hebrew University, published last week by the American Jewish Committee in the American Jewish Year Book 2000, predicted that in the next 80 years, the Jewish population of the United States would decline by one-third to 3.8 million if current fertility rates and migration patterns continue.

In the same period, according to the study, the number of Jews in Israel will likely double, swelling to 10 million.

The study also anticipated a severe decline in the number of Jews in the former Soviet Union. By 2080, the data suggested, the Jewish community there will be virtually extinct.

Among the study's conclusions was that Israel would be home to the world's largest Jewish community as early as 2020, and the majority of the world's Jews by 2050.

The article, Prospecting the Jewish Future: Population Projections, 2000-2080, offers demographic projections for Jewish communities throughout the world in the years 2020, 2050, and 2080. It also offers adjusted scenarios based on changes in fertility rates.

Sergio DellaPergola, chair of the Harman Institute of Contemporary Jewry of Hebrew University, who headed the study, readily concedes that the science of making projections is imprecise and likely to be affected by unforeseen political and technological changes.

But he defends the usefulness of his research. "Don't be swept up by the 2080 numbers," said DellaPergola, whose research team spent three years sifting through hundreds of population studies from around the world.

"Our main interest is in the short term. I do not believe 2020 will be so different than 2000," he said.

Population projections have long been an important tool in helping governments, international organizations and even local communities plan for the future.

DellaPergola points out that the United Nations, for example, utilizes projections though 2150 to make decisions on how its resources can be best deployed.

Jewish communities, struggling to stretch limited financial resources, are no different, he said.

The study noted, in particular, the rapidly aging Diaspora community, saying that by 2080, more than 40 percent of Diaspora Jews will be 65 or older.

The study warned that Jewish social services to the elderly could be overwhelmed as a result.

"Especially as we see the erosion of younger groups in the Diaspora, there is going to be a tough confrontation between those who want to see more money spent on youth programs and those who want the money to go to the elderly community," DellaPergola said.

He also suggested this trend could intensify the current struggle over dividing resources between American Jewry and Israel.

He said he hopes the study will "ring the bell" for Jewish communities, about issues such as these that are looming on the horizon.

Ira Sheskin of the University of Miami, a principal architect of the 2000 National Jewish Population Survey, which is currently under way, called the recent projections "a great starting point for discussion."

But, he added, "do you think if this were the year 1900, what could we have predicted? The Holocaust? The State of Israel? The very concept" of projections "is a difficult one."

Sheskin, DellaPergola and Tobin all agree that at the very least, the study provides a concise snapshot of the current face of world Jewry.

For DellaPergola, creating solutions to the problems they reveal for the future is the next step.

"There is always a chance that a picture that seems negative can be overturned," he said. "But it takes imagination and courage to change."

Internet could help build Ladino dictionary

By VLASTA KOVAC
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ZAGREB, Croatia — The Internet may prove a valuable tool for preserving a language spoken by Jews for more than 500 years.

Sephardi Jews from around the world could help compile a dictionary of Ladino by providing their input via the Internet, according to Winfried Busse, a professor of philology at the Berlin Free University.

Making the suggestion at a recent conference in the southern Croatian city of Dubrovnik, Busse said the Internet could serve as a global workshop for people to create the dictionary.

Ladino, also known as Judeo-Spanish, dates back to the Spanish Expulsion of 1492, when it became a specifically Jewish language.

Several dialects are still spoken in the Balkans. In recent years, there has been a boom of interest in the language among young people, especially within Israel.

During the conference, Busse suggested that speakers of Ladino could use the Internet to provide words, sentences, phrases, proverbs, and even whole stories, using Ladino.

The software for such a dictionary was created by the Philological Institute of the University of Cologne in Germany, he said, adding that it has already been used to make a dictionary of the language used on the Mediterranean island of Sardinia.

A dictionary of Ladino could take one of two forms, he said. It could include all the varieties of the language that are known in various regions. Or it could create, out of all the varieties, a common, standard Ladino.

The choice of how to proceed, he added, would have to be made by the Alta Autoridad de Ladino – the High Authority for the Ladino Language – a body created by Israel's Knesset.

Divorce and Jewish Life in the New Year

I composed these lines in a city of great beauty whose history is both magnificent and horrible for Jews: Budapest, Hungary. This is the city of my birth; at age three, during the Hungarian Revolution of 1956, I left here with my parents and older brother.

Today, there is a great deal of intermarriage in Hungary, notwithstanding the rebirth of Jewish life after the fall of Communism; new schools and Jewish institutions are sprouting everywhere. Before the war, Hungary boasted about 800,000 Jews. This number has since dwindled to some 100,000, most of whom have intermarried or are unaffiliated. Many are either too ignorant of Jewish history or Judaism — or simply too attached to the Hungarian language, culture and friendships — to consider making aliya to Israel.

Although there is plenty of antisemitism here, it is no longer institutionalized; the government is friendly to its Jewish minority and boasts excellent relations with Israel and Jewish organizations worldwide. Therefore, unlike the former Soviet Union, Hungary has experienced no mass migration of its Jewish citizens to Israel in the past decade. Now that Hungary has joined NATO, Hungarian Jews feel more secure.

If assimilation in Hungary can be said to have an upside, it is that intermarried couples who become separated rarely argue over religion when discussing terms of custody and access to children: The downside is that they are too apathetic or ignorant of Judaism to care about decisions that Canadian Jews often struggle with: how to divide the Jewish holidays, which school kinderlach should attend, which branch of Judaism they should be introduced to, who pays for the Jewish private full-day or part-time day school and summer camp.

But what of us in Canada? What, if any, impact does assimilation or intermarriage have on divorce? In my experience, when Jews separate from their non-Jewish spouses, differences in religion do not usually matter when sorting out terms of custody and access to the children. Religion is simply not central to most people's work-focused lifestyles

The issues are usually settled quite simply: the Jew gets the kids on Jewish holidays and the non-Jew gets them on non-Jewish holidays

Each spouse does what he or she wishes about religion during their respective times with the children. This is basically the law of Ontario and most of Canada outside Quebec, ever since the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Young v. Young. But in a few cases, one of the spouses will make religion a big issue out of bitterness or spite, and may even litigate it. Sometimes, this is a tactic to extract better financial concessions or to continue to exert emotional control.

The difference between Canada and Hungary is startling. In Canada, the fact that religion can be a highly contentious issue attests to the liveliness of Judaism in our country, even among some of the many Jews who have intermarried. By contrast, religion barely even registers on the radar screen in a country like Hungary.

For all of Budapest's beauty, I prefer to see separated spouses struggle with their Jewish identity than ignore it altogether. Sometimes we lose sight of what we should be grateful for, even when we are arguing. In later years, historians will look back on Canadian Jewry — our successful fundraising/charitable efforts, the proliferation of new Jewish schools and a vibrant resurgence of interest in Judaism — as our "Golden Age."

On behalf of myself, my family and the law firm of Basman Smith, I would like to wish you and your family a healthy and successful L'Shana Tova.

May you never have to contend with such tsures as divorce and the anguish of the children who go through it.

Rosh Hashanah is the time for your sweet tooth

¼ tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. allspice
¼ cup cold tea or coffee
¼ cup brandy, whiskey or orange juice
½ cup raisins, rinsed and well-drained
½ cup dried apricots, cut up

Preheat oven to 325. Spray a 10-inch bundt pan with non-stick spray. In the processor beat eggs, egg whites, sugar and oil until light. Add honey, mix well.

Combine dry ingredients and spices. Add to batter alternately with tea and brandy. Mix just until blended. Stir in raisins and apricots.

Pour batter into pan. Bake at 325 for 1 hour and 15 minutes or until the cake tests done. A wooden skewer inserted into the centre should come out dry. Remove from oven and let cool for 20 minutes. Loosen the cake from pan with a flexible spatula. Carefully invert onto a serving plate. Yields 20 servings and freezes well.

Founder reflects on growth of film festival over last 25 years

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who could have known? Dusty Cohl, in his heart of hearts, knew.

"We had a feeling it would be the start of something big," he said. And he was absolutely right.

Twenty-five years on, the Toronto International Film Festival, formerly known as the Festival of Festivals, has blossomed into a glittering, star-studded movie festival.

"There isn't a festival in the world that comes close to ours in terms of the quality of films," boasted Cohl, its 71-year-old founder and chief promoter.

This may sound like hyperbole. But Cohl, a retired real estate lawyer, speaks the truth.

Although the Cannes Film Festival is highly regarded and extremely well-hyped, its stylish Toronto competitor has been breathing down its neck for years now.

Variety, the bible of American show business, commented recently that the Toronto festival is the festival of choice among connoisseurs. It is not only Hollywood's favourite in launching premieres and selling new films, but also the venue for European and Asian filmmakers interested in breaking into the lucrative North American market.

Yet, surprising as it may sound today, Hollywood shunned the first Festival of Festivals, boycotting it on the grounds that a North American festival was not the place for a film to debut.

Dusty Cohl greets entertainer Lou Jacobi.

Furthermore, Toronto's media was skeptical, Cohl recalled in an interview as this year's festival, which ran from Sept. 7 to 16, wound down. "The Globe and Mail wondered whether it would be a cornucopia of delights or a dog's breakfast. The Toronto Star adopted a wait-and-see attitude. Only the Toronto Sun saw its possibilities."

When Cohl – the scion of Galician and Russian Jewish immigrants – conceived his idea, he had in mind a festival that would bring the best films from other festivals to town.

Thanks to the contacts he had forged at previous Cannes festivals, Cohl, who usually gravitates toward small, independent films, was able to arrange a fairly impressive line-up for the inaugural Festival of Festivals.

One hundred and forty films from 30 countries, highlighted by a retrospective of Canadian, German and women's films, were screened that year.

Cohl and his friend, Bill Marshall, without whose help and enthusiasm the festival would have remained a gleam in Cohl's eyes, laboured hard to ensure its success.

"We had a zillion things to do," he said. "We worked 26 hours a day. The adrenalin was running high."

Nevertheless, the rug was pulled from under their feet when two big stars – Jack Nicholson and Warren Beatty – reneged on a promise to make an appearance.

The festival was a money-losing proposition in its first year, but the press clippings were glowing. "It was a heck of a festival," said Cohl, a lifetime patron who's no longer operationally involved on a day-to-day or month-to-month basis.

Since then, the festival has grown exponentially.

Consider the statistics. In 1979, 150 films were presented, compared to 329 this past year. Attendance has risen from about 70,000 to more than 300,000. The budget, $1 million in 1983, is now approaching the $7 million mark. The number of accredited journalists has increased from 145 to 775.

All told, the festival has screened 5,790 films, while 4,672 directors, producers, screenwriters and actors have turned up for the festivities.

And due to astute programming, it has been a showcase for such acclaimed movies as Exotica, Reservoir Dogs and sex, lies and videotape.

Cohl, holding court in his trademark black cowboy hat, has taken it all in with aplomb.

"My favourite moments have been people moments," he explained, heatedly denying he is star-struck. "It's people, not stars, who appeal to me."

Cohl, whose most beloved movies include To Catch A Thief and The Party, said the festival owes its phenomenal success to Torontonians, who love films unabashedly.

In 1991, Cohl and his wife, Joan, created the Floating Film Festival, held every other year in January for 10 days on a cruise ship in the Caribbean. "I get a charge out of it," he said. "It's the world's smallest international film festival."

Cohl disclosed that the first journalist to interview him in connection with the inaugural festival was Geneva Berger of The Canadian Jewish News.

Similarly, the last interview he gave at this year's festival was also with the CJN.

"So I've come full circle," he chortled.

PROTEST SONGS OF THE SHTETL, SWEATSHOP AND LABOUR UNIONS

Jerry Gray, the longtime original member of 1950s-era folk-protest group The Travellers, is conducting an eight-week course called Canadian Folk, Labour and Protest Songs for the U. of T.'s school of continuing studies.

According to Gray, songs covered will include those of 19th-century Irish migrant workers, protest songs from the shtetl, songs of new Jewish immigrants, songs of the sweat shops and organizational songs of the Cap Workers, Cloak Makers and other unions.

"I'll also tell some personal stories of my own," says Gray, who sang on picket lines at the age of 16, and worked with the Jewish Labour Committee in the 1950s and 1960s. He recalls "singing out against apartheid, sharing stages with Oscar Peterson and Harry Belafonte for Holy Blossom's stand-in solidarity with Martin Luther King Jr. in 1963, and further fights on behalf of Cesar Chavez and the migrant farm workers."

The course begins Oct. 11 and runs eight weeks. 416-978-2400.

Incidentally, the National Film Board and Cohen Siblings Productions filmed The Travellers in performance at various locations this summer, including at Camp Naivelt's 75th anniversary celebration. Watch for them, along with early Naivelt footage with Pete Seeger, in a retrospective television documentary tentatively scheduled to air in January 2001.

Media Watch: Check out the Sept. 30 edition (Rosh Hashanah issue) of Saturday Night magazine in the National Post. The mag is expected to feature a profile of Judy Feld Carr and her secret rescue of the Syrian Jewish community, which was the subject of a book last year by Harold Troper.

"This is the first time such a story has been printed in a major Canadian magazine," Feld Carr tells us.

That's surprising. You'd think the mags would be falling over each other for such a heroic and moving true-life story.

Pulitzer Prize winner brings 'pops' to the TSO

BY KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For multi-award winning composer Marvin Hamlisch, 57, it was the solitude of writing music that was instrumental in his picking up the baton and becoming the principal pops conductor for both the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra and the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington, D. C.

"When you write music you tend to be alone, as if on a desert island," says Hamlisch. "There is no audience and it gets a little bit lonely. So, during this down time of writing, I decided to do something else. I kind of backed into conducting, it wasn't really anything I thought of doing. It just seemed like it would be kind of fun going from one city to another to work with different orchestras."

From Oct. 2 – 4, Hamlisch will be taking to the podium to lead the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for three nights of pops at Roy Thomson Hall.

The TSO will perform both Hamlisch's songs and a range of other songs. "My concerts are very family orientated. Parents always say that they can't bring their kids to anything, this they can bring them to. We do funny things, including "Rent-A-Composer" where I ask the audience to come up with original titles and I make up songs on the spot. It's a lot of fun and something I've always been able to do."

Hamlisch has won three Oscars, four Grammys, three Emmys, a Tony, three Golden Globes and a Pulitzer Prize.

"Nobody goes out to try to win awards. It is a nice thing that happens," says Hamlisch. "When you win three Academy Awards in one night you become a celebrity. The thing about me is I have a sense of humour and I would go on television shows and be kind of funny. All of a sudden, I was doing shows like Mike Douglas, Merv Griffin and Johnny Carson not once but many times. I co-hosted with Merv Griffin and Mike Douglas."

Born in New York, were he and his wife Terre and their two dogs still reside, Hamlisch's talent for "banging out notes" to match music he heard on the radio, began at the age of 5. As he became more proficient, music became his passion.

His father, a musician himself who played six musical instruments, realised his son's potential and immediately scouted out a good school for him. They enrolled him at the prestigious music school Julliard. Hamlisch also earned a Bachelor of Arts degree at Queens College.

"My first professional job was as a rehearsal pianist on a weekly television show called the Bell Telephone Hour on NBC in New York. I was 19 years old," he says.

Hamlisch's compositions have been an integral part of much that has musically come out of Hollywood and Broadway.

His Broadway credits include They're Playing Our Song, The Goodbye Girl and A Chorus Line, for which he received both a Tony and the Pulitzer Prize.

The composer has penned or adapted over 40 motion picture scores including Sophie's Choice, Ordinary People, The Swimmer, Three Men and A Baby, Ice Castles, Take the Money and Run, Bananas, Save the Tiger, The Way We Were, and Scott Joplin's music in The Sting. The last two garnered him his three Oscars.

As a musical director, Hamlisch has worked with the greatest singers in popular music. His favourite chanteuses being Judy Garland and Barbra Streisand. The Hamlisch/Streisand musical collaborations go deep. Hamlisch was musical director and arranger for Streisand's 1994 concert tour award- winning television special and her Millennium concerts.

Hamlisch is currently writing a new musical based on the movie Sweet Smell of Success to hit Broadway in 2002. "Sweet Smell of Success is all about the world of innuendo, rumours and gossip that go on in the newspaper. And even though it takes place in the '50s, it's very much something that means a lot today," Hamlisch informs.

The composer also has plans to work on a musical version of Woody Allen's Bullets Over Broadway.

"I just really am in a race against time to compose. A lot of conductors have wanted to compose and they can't because they are too busy conducting. I never want that to happen to me. I will always defer to my writing before anything else, because with writing you leave something behind. This is something I can do and bring pleasure to people," he adds.

For tickets to Hamlisch's performances with the TSO call (416) 593-4828.

Yiddishland Cafe pays homage to Chassidism

BY BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO— Yiddishland Cafe, a secular group, paid homage recently to the chassidic movement, with an evening of stories, which have been handed down orally from generation to generation.

"We can't ignore the contributions made to society by the folklore of the Chassidim," said Aaron Fainer, Workmen's Circle chair, in opening the program titled At the Rebbe's Table.

The program recognized the work of Henia and Nachum Reinhartz in researching the chassidic tales, each one with a moral.

The stories, which were sung and related, lent themselves to the story-telling talents of Nathan Garnick, singer David Wall and musicians Martin van de Ven and Sasha Luminsky.

"In those days of the 18th century, women did not go to cheder, and these oral stories, written down by the followers of the Baal Shem Tov, were published in Yiddish so women and prusta menner [men of lower rank] could read them," said Henia Reinhartz.

"They provided a bridge to Yiddish literature, each story having a moral point, but not religious per se."

Writers such as Y.L. Peretz, Sholom Anski, Sholom Asch, and Isaac Bashevis Singer, were descendants of this tradition, she said.

Using English to recap the main plot line, but primarily depending on his expressive, warm Yiddish, Garnick told the stories of the convert to Christianity, who finally came home to his own faith, of the rich merchant who scratched the silver off a mirror so it would be as transparent as the window through which he saw poor people of his own background who needed help, a story which Garnick said is treasured by Toronto children who are learning Yiddish.

He also told of the chassidic rebbe who reminded a wealthy businessman that the blota (mud) which the rebbe's followers dragged over his fine carpets weighed enough to swing the scales of justice in his favour.

The amazing vocal range of Wall, 33, who taught himself Yiddish, was at its best in Ven der rebe tanst (When the rebbe dances), and Sha, Shtil, makht keyn gerider (Shh, hush, don't make any noise).

The son of Naomi and Marty Wall, David is training to be a chazan. He also contributed several niggunim.

Accordionist Sasha Luminsky, a native of the Soviet Union, played a song inspired by the illness of his daughter, and with clarinetist van de Ven, added to the evening's enjoyment.

The Yiddishland Cafe has been invited to Montreal to give a concert at the Jewish Library, October 29, with Michael Mandel, Chaja Talenberg and Nina Shapilsky. They will be performing the Yiddish Poets of New York.

Explore the cool images and beauty of Alaska

By SHEILA DROPKIN
Special to The CJN

ANCHORAGE — While cruising through Glacier National Park is what most tourists think of when they reflect on Alaska, there's more to the state than just this majestic ice – although seeing it is truly one of life's great experiences.

Alaska is a land of legend and myth, heroism and romance, great natural beauty, ice, snow, trackless forests, verdant lands, unnamed rivers, thousands of miles of coastline, three million lakes, miles and miles of tundra and mountains and the legacy of thousands of people who tried to tame it and plunder its natural resources.

Truly exotic, Alaska is so vast that each region has its own distinctive geography, climate and culture. Even its less than 750,000 residents are anything but ordinary, defined as much by where they live as by what they do and how they got there.

Arriving in Anchorage at 11 p.m. in mid-July is quite an experience – despite the hour, it's bright daylight! Darkness (which is more gray than black) doesn't arrive, our cab driver tells us, until about 1 a.m. and disappears again less than four hours later.

In this part of the state, the sun virtually doesn't set in the summer, and there's an average of 19 hours of light per day. In winter, it's just the reverse — with luck, there's light from about 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Many of the residents now regularly utilize the new "happy lights" in order to ward off mid-winter depression.

The largest city in Alaska, Anchorage, has almost 300,000 residents, nearly half the population of the entire state. It started in 1915 as a tent city, serving the railroad workers who laboured to connect Seward, an ice-free port on the Gulf of Alaska, with Fairbanks and the interior. To this day, log cabins still bump up against modern architecture in the downtown core of the city.

Visitors can't help but be surprised by the city's magnificent public and private gardens. In fact, wildflowers abound in the cities and along the roadways, with blue forget-me-nots and red wildfire predominating.

There are two synagogues in Anchorage: the Lubavitch Jewish Centre and Congregation Beth Sholom. Both state in their phone books ads that they welcome Jews of all persuasions and Beth Sholom's rabbi, Henry Rosenfeld, includes his e-mail address.

Fairbanks,with 72,000 residents in the city and its suburbs, which are called boroughs, was incorporated in 1902 and is the state's second-largest city. Nevertheless, the "highlights" of a local tour included a new gas station and WalMart. There seemed to be very little evidence of any cultural activity. The hotels are mediocre at best, and newlyweds take their honeymoon trips in pickup trucks with "just married" streamers hanging from the fenders.

We were taken to the oil pipeline and to a played-out gold mine where we panned for gold. No one gets rich, but you can keep the gold you find (mine was worth all of $18 US).

At dinner in our hotel restaurant, a stylish woman seated near us was accompanied by her husband who was wearing a sleeveless T-shirt, thus showing off his varied tattoos. He wore his baseball cap throughout the meal.

The city has one synagogue, with three Cohens and one Greenblatt listed in the phone directory.

Fairbanks, almost 650 kilometres north of Anchorage, has the state's hottest summers and coldest, longest winters. Suburban children wear miners' helmets with lit lamps while walking to and from school buses in the darkest months of November to March.

Rooftop flower and vegetable gardens on private homes and apartment houses provide additional insulation and keep the plants out of the reach of roaming wildlife. The sight of elk wandering through town, as shown in fictitious Cicely on the long-running TV sitcom Northern Exposure, comes to life regularly in real Alaskan cities.

Juneau, the state capital, was built on the tailings of one of the first important gold strikes in the north. The city, which is actually an island, lives in a tight squeeze between the mountains and the water. Its only access is by boat or plane. It's a shopper's paradise, with many shops selling fine jewelry, leather and fur as well as kitschy souvenirs.

Nearby Mendenhall Glacier is one of the most awesome sites in the state. Weather permitting, a limited number of tourists are permitted each day to fly in by helicopter and take a 15-minute walk on the top, at a cost of about $150 US per person. While this is a truly unique experience, even viewing the glacier from the bottom is quite overwhelming.

One of the most distinctive structures in the city is the public library, built atop a parking garage. When the port-side land was purchased for the library, the powers that be, who deemed cars more vital than books, raised a hue and cry at the "waste of precious space." So a compromise was reached and now vehicles and books share a building.

In the heart of the city is Alaska's oldest church, St. Peter's Episcopal, built in 1899. Its front is made of stone and the stained glass window above the door has a Jewish Star of David. Various stories are told about its origin, but it is largely believed that this was made in error but was too costly to remove and replace, so it's been here for over 100 years.

AND I WILL DWELL IN THEIR MIDST
Orthodox Jews in Suburbia
By Etan Diamond

Using the history of Orthodox Jewish suburbanization in Toronto, Etan Diamond explores the different components of the North American suburban Orthodox Jewish community: sacred spaces, synagogues, schools, kosher homes, and social networks. In a larger sense, though, his book tells a story of how traditionalist religious communities have thrived in the most secular of environments. In doing so, it pushes our current understanding of cities and suburbs and their religious communities in new directions.

Future of Metulla hockey camp in question

Roger Neilson

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon has claimed an unexpected – though certainly non-fatal – casualty: Canadian participation in Roger Neilson's Hockey Camp.

The military pullback and the uncertain security situation that resulted, prompted organizers to cancel the North American participation in the hockey camp, which has been held for the past four summers at the Canada Centre rink in Metulla.

The other key factor leading to cancellation was financial.

A scaled-down camp went ahead as scheduled with 43 Israeli youngsters participating in a one-week program. The camp usually lasts two weeks.

Roger Neilson, formerly head coach with the Philadelphia Flyers and now an assistant with the Ottawa Senators, was on hand to provide on-ice instruction. For Neilson, the camp was noteworthy because it came only months after he received a bone-marrow transplant to treat multiple myeloma.

"Cancellation of the North American camp was a tough decision to make," said Marshall Starkman, co-director of the camp along with Jeff Budd of Kitchener.

The final decision to pull the plug did not come until early July when he decided he couldn't guarantee parents their children would be completely safe.

When the military pullout was first announced, Starkman decided to take a wait and see approach. An early report by a visitor to Metulla indicated "Canada Centre was a virtual ghost town" and that Israelis and tourists were afraid to venture anywhere near the Lebanese border.

A later report indicated life was returning to normal but there were no firm assurances that it was safe to proceed, he said.

A second factor in the decision to cancel was the program's precarious financial condition. In past years, the camp was heavily subsidized by UIA Federations Canada (which directed funds to help construct Canada Centre) and from Partnership 2000, a joint program of the Jewish Agency and UIA.

Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, said fiscal constraints prevented the agency from maintaining past support levels. Furthermore, competition is growing for other "encounter programs" that bring Israeli and Canadian young people together while the number of hockey participants – 19 in 1999 – did not warrant a high level of support, she said.

Partnership 2000 devoted $20,000 (US) to the program, along with $10,000 from the UIA. In past years, the subsidy level reached $60,000. Partnership will not set its 2001 budget until January, she added.

Despite the uncertain situation, 15 North American teens – half from the United States – were signed up for the 2000 camp and that number would probably have been higher except for the security situation, Starkman said.

Eli Rubenstein, who was a key point man for the camp at UIA, said the program created an important link between young Canadians and Israelis. "This is the only UIA project where Canadian and Israeli kids do everything together for the duration of the program."

It is an important morale-booster for people living under the gun in northern Israel, he said.

Starkman said he is hopeful the camp will go ahead next year – perhaps with an added basketball component.

But "unless the camp is financially viable, we can't go forward. We need to know early in the year that there will be the finances for the camp before we invest our time in this," he said.

U.S. swimmer grabs two golds; sets Olympic records

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Millions of immigrants have flocked to the United States looking for streets paved with gold. Lenny Krayzelburg, who came to the United States from Odessa,Ukraine, in 1988 found gold in a pool at the Sydney Olympics.

Krayzelburg set two Olympic records in the 100-metre and 200-metre backstroke events en route to back-to-back gold medals last week. He swam the 100-metre race in 53.72 seconds while it took him 1:56:76 to complete the 200-metre event, breaking his own Olympic record time in the process.

"It's better than anything I've ever done in my life," the Associated Press quoted Krayzelburg as saying after winning the 100 metres.

"Oh my God, there's so much relief, you can't even imagine," he added. "The last 24 hours have been pretty hard. I thought I would stay pretty relaxed, but that hasn't happened."

Krayzelburg was first identified as a potential world-class athlete before he was 10. He attended a Soviet school with 44 other swimmers who went to classes and swam together for 12 hours a day.

In the United States, Krayzelburg helped his family make ends meet by working as a lifeguard at the Westside Jewish Community Centre in Los Angeles.

In other Olympic news reported at www.jewishsports.com, Scott Goldbatt won a silver medal as the U.S. team placed second to the Aussies in the 4 x 200m freestyle relay. The U.S. 4 x 100m freestyle relay team also took second to the Australians, securing silver medals for Jason Lezak and Anthony Ervin, a JCC Maccabi Games alumnus.

Joanna Zeiger of the United States placed fourth in the women's triathlon.

In the 4 x 100m prelims, Israeli swimmers Alexei Manziula, Eitan Orbach, Oren Azrad,and Yoav Bruck finished in a time of 3:22.06, breaking the national record of 3:23.10.

An interfaith rollercoaster

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

One step forward, two steps back. Or is it the other way around?

Either way, Jewish-Catholic relations over the past two decades have been like a rollercoaster ride, filled with steep climbs, sudden dips and plenty of heart-quickening, hairpin turns.

Relations with Jews has been a major theme of Pope John Paul's 22-year papacy, with most of it squeezed into the last two years. While much of the Vatican's efforts have been laudable – built on the historic reforms of the Second Vatican Council, which finally absolved Jews in the death of Jesus – they nevertheless remind me of classic sleight-of-hand; a now-you-see-it-now-you-don't attempt at rapprochement, each advance seemingly tempered with a retreat; every silver lining accompanied by a dark cloud.

Relations between Jews and Catholics "have never been better," Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Synagogue is quoted in last week's Catholic Register. But the focus of those relations, he stressed, have been dominated by the awareness of "difficult moments" between the two faiths.

For instance: Earlier this year, Pope John Paul made his historic and brave visit to Israel. At Yad Vashem, he paid solemn tribute to the Six Million. But as noted in last week's CJN by rabbis Martin Lockshin and Avi Weiss, a short time later, the Vatican announced plans to beatify Pope Pius XII – the very Pope who was in power when the Church turned its back on the Jewish people. That was not long after the Holy See issued an historic statement in which it apologized for the inaction of Catholics during the Holocaust. Yet, the Vatican still refuses a probe into whether it helped Nazis flee to South America.

Up, down, up, down.

So the Vatican drops plans, for now, to move the wartime pope toward sainthood. Commendable. Instead, it fast-tracks the canonization of the 19-century Pope Pius IX, who spoke of Jews as "dogs," and infamously had a Jewish boy kidnapped to be raised as a Catholic.

Up and down.

And throughout all the joint conferences bringing together rabbis, priests and bishops, beyond all the social action programs between synagogues and churches, there was the conferring of sainthood on Edith Stein, a Jewish-born Carmelite nun murdered in a Nazi camp, and the ensuing controversy over whether Catholics were trying to claim Stein as one of their own; as well as the ongoing bitterness over what Jews see as an attempt to "Catholicize" Auschwitz.

In this country, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops is about to release its first-ever statement on Jewish-Catholic relations. According to the conference, the statement hopes to bring an awareness of the Jewish roots of Christianity down to the level of the "ordinary" Catholic worshipper in the pew. Again, commendable.

But the statement will come less than a month after the Vatican issued a declaration essentially rejecting what it said are growing attempts to depict all religions as equal.

It stated, rather baldly, that from a theological point of view, non-Christians "are in a gravely deficient situation" and stand no chance of redemption. The decree prompted one mortified Toronto columnist to say she has donned two bags on her head "in case the first one fell off."

It also prompted at least one rabbi, Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, to say that now that we know Catholics view us as subordinate, perhaps it's time for Jews to end theological exploration with them and focus instead just on joint work on social problems.

A fresh start. Not a bad idea this New Year.

About Seniors

Dr. Mark says...

I love a good quote. In this vein I recently came across a book, the Oxford Book of Ages (1985) which provides, as the jacket gurgles, "an ingenious anthology [which] brings together a kaleidoscope of opinions about every age of life from birth to a hundred."

Over the next column, I shall offer readers a selection of offerings, beginning with the seventh decade.

A false optimism has been portrayed by some wise men of that age group. For example, as Cicero, at age 62 put it, "No one is so old that he does not think he could live another year." After penning these words, he lived one more year.

Humour rescues others. James Thurber, almost always good for a laugh, calculates as follows: "I'm 63 and I guess that puts me in with the geriatrics, but if there were 15 months in every year, I'd be only 43."

For some, the seventh decade still represents only the middle of one's prime years. In 1940, Winston Churchill was already 65 years old. On becoming prime minister in 1940, he proclaimed, "I felt as if I had been walking with destiny, and that all my past life had been but a preparation for this hour and for this trial."

Into the 70s, more and more of history's utterances take on a melancholy tone. Not all do, but most bespeak a sadness and longing for one's lost youth.

The Bible, always a treasure trove of quotations on any subject, has this to say in the (appropriately numbered) 90th Psalm: "The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off and we fly away."

Death, or its proximity, is mentioned more and more. Graham Greene, recounts a fear felt by so many older people, not of death per se, but of the act of dying itself: "Death? At 73, I don't suppose a day goes by when it doesn't cross my mind. One hesitates to start a new book … It's not death that worries me, it's the process. I hope it'll come quickly, say in an air crash."

Despite this overly bleak view, the humorists are still around in their eighth decade trying to joke with the Grim Reaper. To wit, Mark Twain's comment at age 75: "I hear the newspapers say I am dying. The charge is not true. I would not do such a thing at my time of life."

Once again, Churchill, always good for a belly laugh, on his 75th birthday comes out swinging: "I am ready to meet my Maker. Whether my Maker is prepared for the ordeal of meeting me is another matter."

Churchill did finally meet him, but not for another 15 years.

And my final quote from my late grandmother, dedicated to all of my readers, "Bis hundert and zwanzig!"

Dr. Clarfield is the chief of academic affairs at the Herzog Hospital in Jerusalem and a staff geriatrician of the Division of Geriatric Medicine, Sir Mortimer B. David – Jewish General Hospital, McGill University, Montreal.

The Tower of David has always been a symbol of national, political Jewish sovereignty in Jerusalem. Between 1948 and 1967, however, Jews were prevented from visiting the tower by the razor-edged barbed wire fence erected by the Jordanians. Today, every visitor to Jerusalem can visit the citadel, walk upon its ramparts and look upon the sheer, hypnotic splendour of the city that our ancient rabbis described as having received nine out of the 10 measures of beauty that God bestowed upon the world. Jerusalem is eternity and eternity is Jerusalem. "He who has not seen Jerusalem in its glory has never seen a beautiful city." Our sages knew this; and we must too.

Jerusalem

The theme of this year's Rosh Hashanah supplement is Jerusalem. In a certain sense, Jerusalem is once again under siege. The Jewish claim to Jerusalem is derided, diminished or dismissed in diverse quarters around the world.

Many Palestinians now propagate profoundly offensive falsehoods about the Jewish relationship to the city. Hamed Salem, a lecturer in archeology at Bir Zeit University was reported recently in the Jerusalem Report (Sept. 11) to have said: "There is no archeological evidence that either temple existed. It's self evident that the First Temple was fiction. The Second also remains in the realm of fantasy… Even the term Judaism is not very old. There is no record of Judaism before Jesus."

Such ignorant and contemptuous opinions unfortunately are not discounted by Palestinian leaders and decision-makers. To the contrary. They appear to form the basis of policy. For example, as reported in the same issue of the Jerusalem Report, a senior Palestinian official, Saeb Erekat, during the Camp David negotiations in July, asked Israel's acting foreign minister Shlomo Ben-Ami: "How do you know that your Holy Temple was located there?" Erekat was being deliberate, sending the unmistakable message that his people see no special connection, entitlement or claim of the Jews to Jerusalem.

But the campaign against the Jewish claim to Jerusalem is not borne by Palestinians alone. The entire Muslim world has been mobilized by the Palestinians to decry Jewish control of the city. Nor does the western world seem willing to affirm Israel's unique relation to Jerusalem. Just last week, France indicated its readiness to take part in an American initiative to transfer sovereignty over the Temple Mount to the supervision of the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council. And the position of the Roman Catholic Church is well known for its hostility to Jewish control over Jerusalem.

Alas, even some Jews see no higher or deeper Jewish attachment to Jerusalem than to an any other Israeli city.

It is no exaggeration, therefore, to say that history calls upon us to take our turn in defence of Jerusalem. Who, if not us, will care? Who will oppose the lies, challenge the prevarications, and assert the Jewish cause?

But how can we care if we do not know?

That is why this supplement focuses on Jerusalem – to help us know.

"Walk about Zion… mark well her ramparts, traverse her beautiful houses that you will be able to tell it to the generations that follow." (Psalm 48)

Why I chose Yevus to be the capital

By KING DAVID
As told to MARTIN LOCKSHIN
Special to The CJN

In retrospect, I should have realized that choosing Yevus as my people's capital city would be a controversial move. Not that I have lived my life trying to avoid controversy. But for some reason I thought that this move – capturing this fortified city and changing its name to Yerushalayim, the city of peace – would win me only praise, and would lead to some shalom among the Jewish people.

Was I fated never to be the man of peace that I have striven to be? Or will I yet succeed in convincing my people that this city should be the national, political and religious centre of the Jews?

King David
by Pedro Beruguete

To be honest, the nay-sayers do have some logic. I could divide their arguments into two categories: religious and strategic. But if you listen to me carefully, I am sure that I can dispel both of these concerns.

The religious argument runs as follows: "Yevus/Yerushalayim is not the traditional holy place of the Jewish people. We have better candidates for that role."

The Shechem lobby argued reasonably that their city was the traditional Israelite holy place. Abraham, the first Jewish immigrant to the land, first stopped at Shechem and built the first altar to our God there. When Jacob came back to the land from Mesopotamia, he too stopped first at Shechem, bought land there and worshipped God there at a new altar.

In fact, it seems that no Jew who entered the land could avoid stopping at Shechem and building an altar there. Moses even told Joshua that the entire Jewish people had to stop to build an altar there when they first entered Canaan, and they did.

The Betel lobby also has reasonable arguments. Both Abraham and Jacob saw Betel as an important spot for religious activity. The case for Hevron might be the strongest of all. That city seems to combine religious, national and political significance for our people. That's where God appeared to Abraham and told him that he would have children, i.e. that the Jewish people would be created.

That's the first place in the land where a Jew, Abraham, purchased land, and that is where he and the other founding fathers and mothers of our nation are buried. The city has worked well as the political capital of our fledgling monarchy until now.

But I myself have no doubts. I know with the certainty of my faith that Yevus/Yerushalayim is the elusive and unnamed "place that the Lord will choose," that our teachers and prophets have told us about for centuries; the "place to be named later" where God is to be worshipped; the place where His Holy Ark is to find its final resting spot.

But I cannot deny the fact that, aside from the tradition that "Mount Moriah" in the story of the binding of Isaac was the holy mountain quite close to the city of Yevus, Yevus/Yerushalayim has not played any role in Jewish history to date. In the older days when it was called Shalem, it was under the control of that extraordinary pious non-Jewish king, Melchizedek. More recently it has been run by some nasty Jebusites.

Right now, I have to convince my people that there are considerations more important than history in determining which city should be our eternal capital.

That is why it is so important for me to try to counter the secular and strategic arguments that I keep hearing against the choice of Yerushalayim as my capital city. Truth be told, they too have some theoretical merit.

Topographically speaking, Yevus/Yerushalayim is not the best place to build a fort. It is in the heights, but it is hardly the highest land around.

The view when I go strolling on the roof of my palace is truly thrilling, but there are probably better lookout sites in the region. Admittedly, I have grand plans that one day this city will grow and expand to include such serious heights as the Mountain of Olives and Mount Scopus. Who knows, maybe it will even spread as far as the valley called Emek Refaim! But I hardly dare share these thoughts with too many people until they stop referring to the capture of this city as an "escapade."

My strongest argument – the one that I hope will win most people over – for the wisdom of the choice of this new capital, is the strategic geographic one.

For many years Yevus under the Jebusites has been a thorn in the side of the Israelite people. We had captured and we controlled territory all around the city. The tribe of Benjamin lived in the cities of Nov, Bahurim, Gibeah and Anatot, all of them within a few hours walk of Yevus/Yerushalayim. To the south, the tribe of Judah owned territory even closer to Yevus, just a few thousand cubits away.

Ever since the days of Joshua, the grand conqueror of our tradition who vanquished 31 kings, Jewish rulers and leaders have been trying to capture Yevus in order to establish geographical contiguity. But they couldn't do it. Even the author of the book of Joshua seems to have assumed that the problem would last for some time. He wrote: "The tribe of Judah could not dispossess the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Yerushalayim; the Jebusites live in Yerushalayim in the midst of the tribe of Judah until this very day." Thank God that statement is no longer true.

'I finally established a contiguous Jewish settlement'

The Jebusites displayed an amazingly arrogant confidence in their fortifications right until the bitter end. They had no doubt that I would be yet another in the long list of failed Israelite conquerors. You cannot imagine how angry I became when they taunted us.

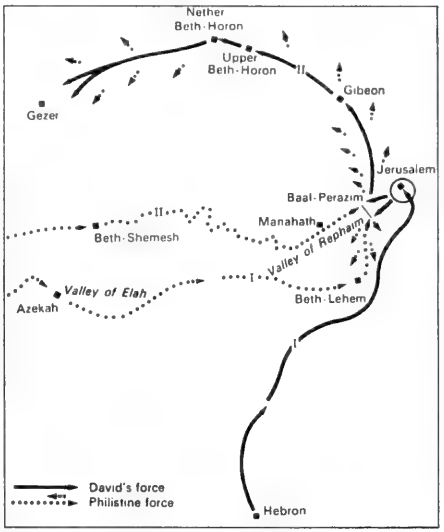
"You'll never get in here, David. You won't be able to capture this city," they said, "unless you can overcome the guards that we have placed on the walls." And then, simply to mock us, they placed on the wall only soldiers who had lost an eye or a leg or who had been crippled. They were trying to say that the walls of the city were so strong and impenetrable that we would never be able to capture it even if they barely defended it.

But capture it we did, with the help of God and with, if I must say so myself, some intelligent commanding of the troops on my part. After we had taken the lower part of the city, the citadel still remained. I remembered well that when I had been a simple soldier, the promise of various rewards had motivated me to work harder for the cause. So I announced that the soldier who first entered the citadel would become my general. That is how the citadel fell and that is how the brash and brave Yoav, the son of Zeruiah, became the commander of my troops.

By capturing that stronghold, I finally established a contiguous Jewish settlement in the area. No longer is there a Jebusite city separating the territories of Judah and Benjamin.

But my accomplishment is, I believe, even greater that that. My biggest challenge as king is to try to unite the various tribes of Israel, to convince them that they are one people and that decentralization is a bad idea. "Tribe rights"are well and good, but when we have enemies as strong as the Philistines breathing down our necks we better be willing to see ourselves as a united confederation. From that perspective Yevus/Yerushalayim is ideal. It is precisely because it has no history and no past of a Jewish nature that it is, davka, the perfect candidate. It belongs neither to Benjamin nor to Judah.

My capital for the last 7½ years, Hevron, simply has too much history and is too closely associated with the tribe of Judah, my tribe. (I once heard somebody say that our land has much too much history and not quite enough geography; boy, is that right!) There are still some people who see me as a usurper who illegitimately wrested the monarchy away from the tribe of Benjamin, the first tribe to have an Israelite monarch, the tribe descended from the favoured wife, Rachel. Again, I have no doubt that my kingship is the legitimate one, supported as it is by the prophet Samuel and by the ancient promises to Jacob that the staff of rulership would belong to the tribe of Judah. But it does not hurt for me to look impartial.



Yerushalayim, the city that has no Jewish history and no Jewish past, also has other advantages. It is centrally located halfway between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. Its mountain air gives it one of the most pleasant climates of any place in the country.

So much for Yerushalayim's theoretical advantages. Let me tell you how my plans have worked out in practice. So far, in the short time that we have controlled the city, matters have progressed well but not 100 percent smoothly. My plan was to convert Yevus/Yerushalayim as quickly as possible into the centre of all religious activity in the country.

The most important thing was to get the Ark of the Covenant into the city. I swore to the Lord that:

'One of the most religious experiences'

I will not enter my house,
Nor will I mount my bed,
I will not give sleep to my eyes
Or slumber to my eyelids, until I find a place for the Lord,
An abode for the Mighty One of Jacob. Advance, O Lord, to your resting place, You and Your mighty Ark.

God seemed to accept my plan readily and swore to me that:

The Lord has chosen Zion,
He has desired it for His seat.
This is my resting place for all time;
Here I will dwell for I desire it.
I will amply bless its store of food,
Give its needy their fill of bread.
I will clothe its priests in victory,
Its loyal ones shall sing for joy.
There will I make a horn sprout for David,
I have prepared a lamp for My anointed one.
I will clothe his enemies in disgrace,
While on him his crown shall sparkle.

That seemed like a clear go-ahead from the Almighty, but the story turned into a bittersweet one.

The first time we tried to move the Ark here to Yerushalayim, we were all dancing around the Ark which was travelling on a new cart.When the oxen who were pulling the Ark stumbled, my dear friend Uzzah forgot himself and reached out and grasped the Ark to steady it. God was angry with Uzzah and he died on the spot.What should have been the happiest of religious festivals turned into a tragedy.

'I danced with all the people'

It would be three more months before we would try again. This time we were successful on the communal level. There was no public disaster – only a private one for me.

It was one of the most emotional religious experiences of my life – moving the Ark to Yerushalayim. I wore clothes that would not separate me too much from the people, hardly my finest, and I danced with all the people. I leaped and I whirled with all my might. We blew the ram's horn, we sacrificed our sacrifices, and the Ark entered Yerushalyim with, so I thought, great joy.

The joy was in fact great throughout the country, but not in my own home. My wife, Michal, daughter of the former King Saul, chastised me spitefully for my populist behaviour. She was brought up in a royal household and she has always suspected that a former shepherd, like me, does not really know how to be a king. Her sarcasm was so obvious and cutting: "Didn't the king of Israel do himself honour today, exposing himself today in the sight of the slavegirls of his subjects, as one of the riffraff might expose himself!" Riffraff, she called me! Is dancing in front of God's Ark beneath the dignity of the king?

But even that was not the worst snag in my religious plans for this city. I was so sure that God would be delighted with my plan to build Him a temple here in Yerushalayim.

'Idea of building temple seemed so clear'

Here I am living in a house of cedar while the Ark of the Covenant is housed in a tent. The idea of building a Temple to God seemed so clear, so obvious. And the prophet Nathan at first encouraged me: "Go and do whatever you have in mind, for the Lord is with you." Then, out of the blue, he brought me the opposite message from God. "Are you the one to build a house for Me to dwell in? You will not build a house for My Name, for you are a man of war and have shed blood." Nathan told me that God would build a house for me, in the form of a dynasty, but that I would not build a house for God. I certainly hope that these snags are not an omen for the future.But there is one accomplishment of mine that I am most proud of. Yerushalayim is, I truly hope, the eternal capital of my people, but it also has a clear international flavour. While I routed the Jebusite soldiers defending the city, I have managed to keep a warm personal relationship with my good friend Araunah the Jebusite. He would do anything for me even though he is not part of our people. Just around the corner from my palace, my loyal and trusting soldier Uriah the Hittite lives. Would that all Israelites were as faithful and dependable as that Hittite! And the palace that I am living in here in Yerushalayim has a genuine Lebanese flavour to it. King Hiram of Tyre sent cedar logs, carpenters and stonemasons and they built this magnificent building in which my family and I live.

Martin Lockshin

Maybe that will be my greatest accomplishment – if I succeed in making Yerushalayim into my Jewish capital while keeping its international flavour. I am delighted that members of the "defeated" peoples like the Jebusites and Hittites still feel at home here with us. And I am pleased that other monarchs in the region are reaching out to my capital city with warmth and friendship.

I wanted Yerushalayim to be Judaism's religious centre, a place of spirituality and of peace, not of religious conflict and disagreement. I hope that future years will bring more religious tranquility to the city than I have seen so far in my lifetime.

One day someone will build a Temple here in Yerushalayim. Let us hope that it unites the Jews and that it will also be a "house of prayer for all nations."

The above essay is historical fiction. It makes absolutely no claim to historical accuracy or to religious truth. It is loosely based on a number of biblical books: the seventh book of Jewish Antiquities by Josephus, David Ha-Melekh by Aharon Reuveni, David: From Shepherd to Messiah by Yair Zakovitch, and on many flights of fancy. The poem in the middle of the essay is an abridgement of the translation of Psalm 132 in the New Jewish Publication Society's Tanakh: The Holy Scriptures.

Martin Lockshin is a professor at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University. He has just returned to Toronto from a year's sabbatical in a Jerusalem suburb, a few kilometres away from the ancient fortress of Yevus.

Seeking justice in Israel:

Can halachic and secular law co-exist in a Jewish democracy?

By ITZHAK ENGLARD

In the Jewish tradition, justice is intimately and inextricably linked to Jerusalem and Zion: After lamenting the City's catastrophic decline by its loss of justice (1:21), the prophet Isaiah exclaims, by way of hope and consolation (1:26-27): "I will restore your judges as the first, and your counsellors as at the beginning. Afterward you shall be called 'The city of justice, a faithful town.' Zion shall be redeemed with justice, and they that return to her with righteousness." And later, in the same spirit (33:5): "He has filled Zion with law and righteousness."

Itzhak Englard

The prophet's consoling promise of restoring the judges to Jerusalem has become part of the thrice-daily prayer of the observant Jew. Jeremiah also prophesies the ultimate return of the city to its essence as being the habitation of justice and holy mountain (31:22). In Isaiah's vision, the culmination of redemption is (2:3): "For out of Zion the law shall go forth, and the word of the Eternal from Jerusalem."

The challenge to be the universal city of justice is awe-inspiring. Moreover, on the background of the Jewish religious tradition, it is even frightening, since that tradition conditions the Jewish people's very presence both in the Holy City and in the Holy Land upon the implementation of law and justice.

It seems that no other people has experienced, to the measure the Jewish people has, the peculiar, fragile relationship between territory and people. Not only has the Jewish tradition emphasized the people's original coming to a promised land from elsewhere, but it also furthered the collective consciousness of living there under the permanent threat of exile as the ultimate sanction for religious misbehaviour. The holier the place, the stricter the Divine scrutiny; and Jerusalem ranks highest in holiness.

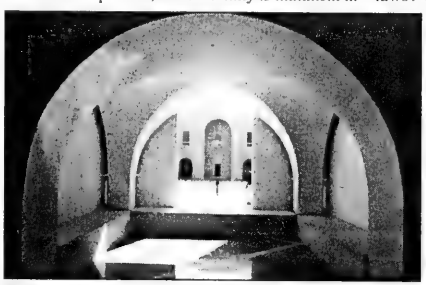
Furthermore, the holier the place, the greater the number of possible human pitfalls, and hence the heavier the personal responsibility.

All this may cross my mind when sitting on the bench in the superb building of Israel's Supreme Court in Jerusalem. True, given the enormous workload of our court, the opportunity to ponder the essence of our judicial task in the capital of the renewed Jewish state remains, by necessity, a kind of luxury reserved to the rare hours of intellectual leisure.

The re-established Jewish statehood raises, indeed, questions that are vexing for the spirits of most Jews, religious as well as secular. Yet, ultimately, these questions are by no means novel. Touching upon the fundamentals of Jewish existence in this world, they have filled the thoughts of many scholars, past and present: Are we the participants in a Divinely-guided historia sacra, or are we the autonomous actors in a regular, profane history?

More specifically, has the long-desired and dreamt-of return of the Jewish people to Eretz Yisrael, especially after the Holocaust, any specific eschatological, messianic significance, or is it a normal historical event to be explained by the ordinary rules of cause and effect?

The answer, in principle, seems clear for the secular Jew: In the spirit of the 17th-century Jewish philosopher Baruch Spinoza – who has appropriately been called the first modern Jew – all history is profane, since Divinity is imminent in all reality. In a famous passage in his Theological-Political Treatise, Spinoza explicitly defines the possible re-establishment of a Jewish state as an ordinary historical event based on given political circumstances.



Values of truth, mercy and compassion are incorporated in Jerusalem's new Supreme Court Building.

However, even this agnostic approach does not solve the fundamental problem of the essence of modern Jewish statehood, assumedly to be founded on democratic principles. Thus, what does the Jewishness of a state signify in the actual world of cultural and ethnic pluralism? Is there not an inherent contradiction between the notion of democracy and that of a Jewish state? And more specifically, in relation to my judicial function: is there a specific "Jewish justice" as distinguished from universal justice? And finally, is there a Jewish culture that can be separated from the Jewish religion?

These queries have caused great measure of uneasiness in a variety of circles of the Israeli population. Strangely enough, some people even believe that it is in our court's power to resolve these problems by way of adjudication.

The dilemma of the religious Jew is even more acute. Assuming the actuality of Divine providence and the reality of a "sacred history," how is one to relate to the existence of a modern secular Jewish state – a novel and rather surprising phenomenon that has not been envisaged by the Jewish religious tradition?

Are the ingathering of the Jewish people in the Holy Land, and the establishment by it of an autonomous political entity positive signs of the beginning of messianic times? Are we, the judges sitting in Jerusalem, the fulfilment of the ancient prophecies and the positive answer to the daily prayers?

Or, on the contrary, does the existence of a secular – and hence, religiously illegitimate – state signify the ultimate temptation of Satan, the prohibitive obstacle to messianic redemption? And, therefore, are we judges merely the devil's instruments by applying secular laws? Or is the whole occurrence of Jewish statehood indifferent from an eschatological point of view?

The latter view is a legitimate option, since even from a religious perspective, based as it is upon the premise of freedom of will, political events may be the result of purely human doings. According to this more neutral view, the existence of the Jewish state has to be integrated, at least under the premises of Jewish Orthodoxy, into the traditional pattern of the Halachah, the rabbinical law, that remains applicable throughout historical times.

In other words, no attempt is made to give the actual Jewish state either a positive or a negative eschatological significance. The state is conceived as a historical reality that has no specific religious meaning. The individuals living in its framework are duty-bound to abide by the traditional religious law.

All three contrasting views are present in contemporary religious Jewry. Being part of the official judiciary, I naturally do not consider myself as the delegate of Satan in carrying out the latter's demonic schemes of delaying redemption. On the other hand, who would dare regard himself as the prophesied ideal judge of Messianic times, even should

Challenge to confront religious tradition with modernity

one assume to be living and acting at the very earliest, smallest and hesitant beginnings of these times?

Our daily work of adjudicating cases of common criminals – embezzlers, thieves, robbers, rapists and murderers – does not give one the feeling of living in a world that has even started to be redeemed. Indeed, how much hatred, resentment and envy does one encounter in our task of administering justice!

Moreover, the ideological issues brought before our court – and there are many, too many – bear witness of the deep cleavages besetting Israel's society. Justice in an unredeemed Jerusalem.

What does all this signify for me? Having grown up as a religious Zionist in the shadow of the Holocaust, the establishment of an independent Jewish state was for me a most significant event that affected me deeply. Ideologically, it constitutes in my view the tremendous challenge of confronting the Jewish religious tradition with modernity in its fullest political and social dimensions.

This challenge is, in my understanding, vital to Judaism. It demands from us a number of religious responses to problems that have not faced Jewry in the Diaspora, since they have sprung from political independence. Besides constitutional questions concerning the structures of the respective state organs, the most fundamental ones relate to the very function and mission of the Jewish state.

In the traditional, religious view, as expressed by Maimonides, the great medieval Jewish philosopher and rabbinical scholar, the Jewish state's function is to bring the individual to moral and intellectual perfection. The latter is achieved by the comprehensive, philosophical knowledge of Divinity, conceived in its broadest sense of comprising the totality of cosmic reality, physical as well as metaphysical.

External view of the Supreme Court

In Maimonides' conception, there is only one way to reach that ultimate perfection: life according to the Divine precepts as laid down by the eternal law of the Torah. Hence, it is the Jewish state's foremost duty to enforce that law upon all its citizens.

This basically platonic conception of statehood evidently clashes with the notion of the modern, democratic state, since the latter should neither be concerned with the individual's moral perfection, nor with the even more sublime, intellectual one. All the modern, democratic state has to care for is the physical welfare of its inhabitants, enabling them to pursue their autonomously determined ways of happiness.

Israel aspires to be a modern, democratic state, though with the declared aim to be equally a Jewish state. How to reconcile these apparently contrasting aspirations? This dilemma is epitomized by the judicial task, since that touches upon the heart of the ideological conflict: the crucial choice between adjudication according to traditional Jewish law or according to secular state law.

The rabbinical Jewish tradition, contrary

'Our mission is a permanent striving for harmony'

to Christianity, has, as mentioned, no historical experience with the reality of Jewish secular state organs; hence, it lacks the basic conceptual tools for a positive solution – as distinguished from a merely negative one that would deny in toto the legitimacy of secular law.

Some contemporary Jewish scholars have made attempts to find, in the halachic tradition, approaches that would enable an elaboration of a more modern conception of Jewish statehood, in general, and of the relationship between rabbinical authority and that of (secular) state organs, in particular.

Some rely on the fundamental traditional distinction between Kingdom and Sanhedrin, each authority having its respective domain of autonomy; others refer to the (limited) legislative authority granted by religious law to the community as such.

In my understanding, it is very difficult to find in the traditional religious framework a place for secular autonomy, in its full anthropocentric, modern sense. In this respect, I would place myself into the circle of neo-Orthodoxy, that accepts modernity, as such, by confronting it in a fundamentally positive sense with the religious tradition.

No doubt, this position is inherently ambivalent, since it attempts to reconcile sharply conflicting approaches to human life. But, reality, as suggested by the great Danish physicist and Nobel prize winner, Niels Bohr, requires, for its full understanding, what he called a complementary approach.

The idea of complementarity means that it is not only permissible, but necessary, to apply to the physical world mutually exclusive models. One of the more famous examples is the phenomenon of light that appears in experiments both as particle and as wave. Similarly, since human existence is fraught with internal contradictions, I believe that our mission is a permanent striving for harmony between the irreconcilable elements, a striving that constitutes an ongoing and painful process in a unredeemed world.

In my view, the significance of all this is in the context of the Jewish state, the acceptance of both the Jewish religious tradition and the modern notion of a democratic state, even if they are conceived as two contrasting models of social life. This attitude entails a number of pragmatic consequences in my judicial task. Thus, where appropriate, I have recourse to the rich rabbinical legal tradition, as a source of inspiration to the solution of complex conflicts.

As a matter of fact, Israeli law explicitly refers to the Jewish legal heritage in cases of gaps in the law. This reference may be devoid of religious meaning in a strictly normative sense, but it remains the expression of a striving for harmony between Jewishness and modernity.

Its practical, educational effect may be marginal, since legal opinions are generally a matter of professional lawyers, except in cases of conflicts of high political and ideological visibility. But the very combination of religious and secular law always retains a certain symbolic value.

Preserving social order a crucial religious task

The administration of justice has, in my opinion, a further important dimension that is highly relevant from a purely religious point of view. One of the first Divine commandments given to humankind – according to the Jewish tradition it was imposed already upon Adam – is the general duty to maintain law and order.

Living in an imperfect world, and more particularly in an imperfect Jewish state, we still are duty-bound to enforce the universal, Divine precept of preserving law and order so as to protect the integrity of both body and property of the individuals. Protection of these fundamental human rights implies the punishment of their violators. Thus, when sitting in criminal cases, I have the certain feeling that by convicting and punishing offenders, I am fulfilling a crucial religious task by helping to preserve the social order.

Living in an imperfect Jewish state

Accordingly, by way of illustration, the restoring, to the victims of crime or civil wrongs, the property unlawfully converted or detained by the defendants, is in my eyes a foremost religious duty. Maimonides counts, indeed, among the official duties of the King – today properly represented by the (republican) State – besides that of raising the true religion and conducting holy wars, the duty of filling the world with justice by "breaking the arms of the wicked" (Laws of Kings, 4:10). Thus, Judaism looks upon the earthly concern of administering justice, in the broadest sense, as being of very important religious significance. I would add that this is even so where the religious law, as such, is not implemented in its pure and ideal form.

The Halachah grants the civil authority a large measure of autonomy in establishing the proper ways of fighting crime and protecting the property and bodily integrity of its subjects. In pursuing these vital aims of social order, the civil authorities have, according to the religious law, the power to deviate, for the purpose of effectiveness, from the traditional legal rules – evidentiary as as well substantive ones.

It remains justice in an imperfect world. But I sense that administering it in Jerusalem, the capital of the re-established Jewish state, is of profound significance. It makes up part of the unique challenge to confront the rich tradition of Judaism with the totality of modern human life in society in all its manifestations.

To me, it is the task of reconciling, in a complementary way, two inconsistent premises, that of traditional Judaism and that of political modernity. Can we live up to this enormous challenge? At least we are trying it, being fully conscious of our very limited capacities. Let us pray for true justice in Jerusalem.

The Western Wall

The magical thing is how we meet here
how our spirits meet here
how we've all stood here at one time or another and breathed
the same breath
how it invites soothes and touches our soul
it's like meeting at the core of our hearts
the base of our roots

How we've all walked a tip-toed ritual dance to caress it and bury a kissed message within its grasp devoured
in timelessness

How we've all met each other and ourselves here at that sacred place that takes us back way back to ancient ancient scrolls how even if we've never met face to face
our souls have met here and how that makes us all family

To be here is something else at the time you know it's something else and you try you try to open yourself up wide enough as wide as the Mediterranean but for that time you are but a seashell and you hold on and drink each drop but the magic is only fully known once it's gone

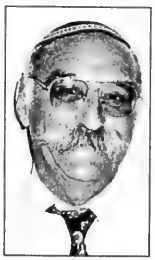
District archeologist of Jerusalem: 'I felt on top of the world'

By DAN BAHAT

I have served for many years as the district archeologist of Jerusalem, a government position that meant having full control of anything connected with archeology in the city and its immediate vicinity. It has truly been one of the most exciting jobs in the world, and for many years, I have felt as if I were on top of the world.



Dan Bahat

Whenever somebody wished to build a house or any structure in Jerusalem, he had to submit the plans to me for my approval. It gave a real feeling of power, and I had to use it very carefully.

Before 1967, when Israel had only the western part of Jerusalem, the work was less interesting. The Israeli Law of Antiquity requires the Department of Antiquities, where this is deemed appropriate, to declare a certain area as an antiquity site. This means that no one, not even the owner of the land, can do anything in this area without the consent of the department.

There are a few such sites on the western side of the city, mostly with tombs dating from the Second Temple period. One of them, the Tomb of Jason located in the Rehaviah neighbourhood, became a national monument as it was well preserved. Otherwise, since the cemeteries of that period are scattered around the entire city, none of the tombs was considered worth preservation and purchased for the use of the public.

In 1967, however, soon after the Six Day War the department declared the Old City as an antiquity site (Aug. 31, 1967) and extended the law to the eastern part of the city. The Old City of Jerusalem, with all its historical and religious sites, is altogether a different story. The sites are located not only inside the Old City but also outside of it, in places like Mount of Olives and the Kedron Valley.

Following the Six Day War, large-scale building activities around the city were initiated by the Israeli government; the intention was to encircle the eastern part of the city with Jewish neighbourhoods. These activities required many excavations, as the area was scattered with ancient sites, especially in the neighbourhood of Giv'at HaMivtar and Ramat Eshkol, which were excavated on a large scale, as there was a concentration of many tombs from the Second Temple period. Many Hebrew inscriptions and a lot of information were acquired as a result of these excavations.

Till this point, everything I have said could be said by anyone who is interested in the history of the city and knows Jerusalem. From the position of district archeologist, however, everything looks different.

'The work in Jerusalem changed my life completely'

I live outside the city in a small neighbourhood, a green suburb connected to Jerusalem by the highway connecting the city to the coastal plain and Tel Aviv. Every day when I go to the city, five kilometres away, I see the signs saying: Jerusalem, 4 kms... Jerusalem, 2 kms... etc. Every day when I drive past these signs I think to myself: "Is this the Jerusalem that so many generations of Jewish people were dreaming about and praying for?"

Indeed, these thoughts keep returning. Today, when I serve as the archeologist of the Western Wall (the Kotel Hama'aravi), these thoughts are even stronger.

The work in Jerusalem changed my life completely. Till the Six Day War I was just another archeologist. I studied Bronze Age and Iron Age material, and my great love was Egyptology. I studied hieroglyphs (which I still try to read sometimes) and prepared to write my PhD on the relations between Egypt and our country in the 16th century BCE.

And then came the 1967 war. It changed everything. I was fascinated by the city and became chained to it with chains of love and interest. I started to take people for walks in the narrow lanes of the Old City, and I realized that there was not enough literature available in Hebrew that provided historical descriptions of the city. I sat for days translating texts from various languages, to enable people to see how little the city has changed since the medieval era. The book written then is still in use, and it was only recently printed again because of the demand. This work enhanced my desire to know more. Today, after 30 years, I have to admit that there is still a lot to study, and I will never know as much as I would like to about the city.

There is no other city in the world about which so much has been written. One important reason is that it was destroyed so many times that there are no remains from periods when the city flourished.

A good example is the Roman period when Jerusalem was reconstructed as a pagan city in 135 CE, following the Bar-Kochba revolt. This is the period when the Roman world reached its apex. Most of the cities that one visits today around the Mediterranean date from that century. Generally, the cities of that time are more or less well preserved, and, therefore, the scholars deal with secondary problems such as meaning of buildings, the city plan, etc.

The case of Jerusalem is completely different: After the spread of Christianity, many of the pagan structures were wiped out by the new religion. In Jerusalem, the change from paganism to Christianity was different from elsewhere, because it became a holy city to the Christians and the construction of churches began. The change which the city underwent from a small provincial town in the framework of the Roman Empire to become the spiritual capital of the world – this was a real change, one which we cannot always follow.

'We try to explain why so much is written about Jerusalem'

One may say that actually we don't know the Roman city at all. With the development of the study of Jerusalem, many facts that scholars believed they knew pertaining to the city of that period were found to be wrong. Such cardinal questions as who built the walls of Jerusalem and when it happened, what there was on the Temple Mount on the site where the Jewish Temple was, are not yet satisfactorily answered. Recently the precise location of the camp of the 10th Roman legion stationed in Jerusalem, which we believe was near the present day Citadel, even this has been challenged.

The Roman period is thus one period that is not clear enough, but what about the others? The city of the First Temple period may be the best example to illustrate the change in opinions about the city since the Six Day War. We try to explain why so much was written about Jerusalem – more than about any other city. This is simply because things are not clear and therefore every scholar has his own opinion and he writes about it – and so there is another paper.

During the Second Temple period, Jerusalem was defended by three walls. We know this because Josephus Flavius, the Jewish historian of the period, left quite a thorough description of the city. He tells us about the alignment of these walls and we rely on his writings. The alignment of the Second Wall (so dubbed by him) became extremely important to Christian scholars, as it helped determine the authenticity of the site of the hill of Golgotha and the site of the tomb of Jesus. It is beyond description how many papers were written about the Second Wall, all attempting to find the right alignment for it.

The Yochanan Ben Zakkai Synagogue destroyed by the Jordanian forces. [WZPS]

The First Wall and the Third Wall are both known to us, because, during the many years of excavations in Jerusalem, long sections of these walls came to light. The Second Wall lies under the Old City, in an area where it is not possible to dig to find any part of it. The result is that one may write a lot about it, trying to find a solution to this intriguing problem of Jerusalem, and yet not find a decisive answer.

Here is another example: The First Temple period has been discussed by scholars since they began to study the city in the 19th century. The questions were always: What were the dimensions of the biblical city, where was it located, and did it undergo changes during the long period of the First Temple (about 400 years from 960 BCE to 586 BCE)? There were two schools that tried to answer the questions. One believed that the city was limited to the low hill situated south of the Temple Mount, today named the Hill of the City of David; the other school thought the city was much larger and expanded beyond that hill to what we now call the Western Hill, which includes today's Armenian Quarter, Jewish Quarter and Mount Zion.

The Six Day War enabled scholars to find answers

For years it seemed that the "smaller" theory was the right one. But here, again, the Six Day War gave the opportunity to learn the decisive answer. The government of Israel decided to rehabilitate the Jewish Quarter and required that excavations be done at the site of every building worked on there. This was the largest area ever to be excavated in Jerusalem and it has revealed astonishing facts. It was found that till the eighth century BCE, Jerusalem was indeed small and its real virtue was that in the small limits of the city, the Judean kings had installed a legal system, with courts and a taxation system over the entire kingdom. At the end of the eighth century BCE, King Hezekiah enlarged the city by annexing to it the Western Hill.

After 1967, work begins on one of the many ruined synagogues in the Jewish Quarter of the Old City. [WZPS]

This may seem to the layman a fact that could be overlooked, but to the reader of the Bible, especially the books of Kings and the prophets, the picture of Jerusalem as a large and quite a wealthy city is important. Archeologists believe that Jerusalem grew because the Kingdom of Israel was destroyed by the Assyrians and many Israelites immigrated to Judah, its twin sister kingdom. Again archeology is beneficial for those to whom Jerusalem is a spiritual focus and for anyone who wants to understand the phenomena described in the Bible.

The above information could also interest the non-Jewish biblical scholars who deal with Old Testament studies. During the many years of my study of the city, I always insisted on an unbiased treatment of the various cultures in the city. Jerusalem is an important Christian and Islamic centre. The most imposing monuments, such as the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the Dome of the Rock and many monuments of the Mameluke period (14th and 15th centuries CE) have been studied at length since the Six Day War. This was the first time in the history of the exploration of Jerusalem that there was easy access to every corner of the city and no restrictions on the scholars who worked there. No wonder, therefore, that the British Academy then did a survey of Islamic buildings in the city, something they did not dare to do when they ruled the country from 1917 to 1948.

Israeli archeologists have been accused of giving preference to Jewish monuments rather than to the important Christian or Muslim ones. The examples above, describing the new attitudes to old queries, one of which pertains to a completely non-Jewish history, show that there is no basis whatsoever for this accusation.

One day as I walked in the Muslim Quarter in the Old City, I entered a blacksmith shop. To my great surprise, I realized that I was in an intact church of the Crusader period. I was even more surprised to find out that none of the scholars had ever noticed this before. When I started to work on a publication about the church, I saw that the last time Crusader Jerusalem had been studied was in 1926. So I knew that this was going to be my field of study. To this day, I write about that period in Jerusalem, as well as the period before and after it – times when Jerusalem was ruled by either Christians or Muslims, and the Jewish community of the city was small and insignificant.

As district archeologist of Jerusalem, I have met people from all over the world, and I felt it was a good opportunity to convey my thoughts about Jewish life in the city. The exciting story that should be told is the one describing the Jewish attempts, throughout history, to remain in Jerusalem, no matter what hardships were encountered. Under the Mamelukes, the rulers of Jerusalem did all they could to make life in the city impossible for the Jews, for example through high taxes that the community could not pay, making it a focus for blackmail and persecution.

Annihilated the Jewish community

The Crusaders actually annihilated the Jewish community of the city, and the pilgrims who visited Jerusalem speak about four Jews, or even only one Jew, living in the city. This situation did not deter the Jews from returning to Jerusalem, and soon after the expulsion of the Christians from the country, the Jews settled in the city again and founded the present day Jewish Quarter. This was not easy, as Muslim law did not allow the construction of any non-Muslim place of prayer. One can imagine what it took for the Jews to build their synagogue and maintain it. Nevertheless they did.

What is the connection with archeology? During the excavations in the immediate vicinity of the Temple Mount, the expedition digging there discovered a house dating from the late Byzantine period (sixth and seventh century CE). On one of the lintels of the house, three menorahs were discovered.

The identity of this as a Jewish house is beyond doubt, but who lived there and when? Using historical documents, many of which refer to the Jews living in the city, we can try to understand when a building might have served as a Jewish habitation or a place of prayer. The house in question most likely is from the period of the Persian invasion of the country in 614 CE, when the Jews who had been denied the right to live in or even enter the city, joined the invaders and were rewarded by the right to live there. Their joy did not last; the Byzantines came back 15 years later and the restrictions resumed.

'Jews looked for a new outlet for desire to pray' knowledge on Jewish life is the famous Genizah from Cairo. This is a collection of about 100,000 documents dating from the 10th to the 19th centuries. It is being published slowly, and occasionally, a document about Jewish life in Jerusalem comes to light. After the Muslim conquest of the country, the Jews were allowed to resettle in Jerusalem. At first, they were also allowed to pray on the Temple Mount, but later that was forbidden.

The Jews looked for a new outlet for their desire to pray at their holy place. The solution was typical of Jewish methods of survival in the city; they developed a new habit of circling around the Temple Mount and stopping at each gate to say a certain prayer. In the Cairo Genizah, 10 different texts were found describing the custom. The gates of the Temple Mount have Hebrew names, unknown from other sources.

Excavations beside the Western Wall reveal a Herodian street dating back almost 2,000 years. [Israel photo]

The excavations along the Western Wall taught us other new facts: We learned that the Wall was entirely exposed until the 14th century and that the gates from the Second Temple period were still in use when the Jews did their circuits.

One of them, the one now called Warren's Gate after Sir Charles Warren, the British 19th-century scholar who found it, was also the main synagogue of the small Jewish community for some centuries in the early Muslim period. This synagogue is mentioned in the documents of the Cairo Genizah. It was located due west of the Stone of Foundation housed in the Dome of the Rock and the site of the Holy of Holies of the Temple. This was the closest the Jews could approach the holy place.

We have also learned that in the 14th century, the Wall was concealed behind the Mameluke monuments. The Jews had to look for a new place of prayer and they found a small section of the Western Wall, which they made their place of prayer. This section of the Wall today forms the northernmost part of the praying plaza of the Kotel.

In 1546, an earthquake struck Jerusalem. Many buildings along the Wall collapsed and it gave the Jews an opportunity to expand their prayer plaza south, over the ruins of these buildings. Thus, the present praying plaza was created. This short history of the Wall could not have been told without the contribution of archeology to the history of Jerusalem.

In Jerusalem, then, as a result of the combination of archeological finds, historical documentation and above all, the love of the Jewish people for Jerusalem and its inhabitants, one may have full satisfaction living there and enjoying the marvels of the city.

Elevation rendering of Jerusalem's New City Hall

Project Trip: Jerusalem City Hall 1990

By A. J. DIAMOND
Special to The CJN

These are reflections from a project trip in 1990 to Jerusalem to build its new city hall.

A. J. Diamond

Work related travel is the best way to be a tourist. This ensures access to the working life of a country. It means becoming involved, at least for the life of a project, especially a project to build a public building, in issues of the moment and the personalities engaged in their resolution.

The process of travel itself, however, seldom has such appeal. Only by checking the date stamps in my passport and meeting notes do I keep track of my trips to Israel.

In one period of 13 months there were eight visits. This is not made easier with a seven-hour time difference and an aircraft change in either Frankfurt or Zurich, duplicating check in, security and boarding procedures. The five-hour delay this creates does nothing for the allure of travel. Nor do the passport, security and airline personnel in these airports, who must, I feel, be sent from central casting – each a caricature of national stereotypes.

This is the second leg of my trip. After an overnight trans-Atlantic crossing, the effects of the journey catch up with me. I feel I ought to be interested in the changing landscape as we fly over, but a drowsy languor overtakes me, and I succumb to a sumptuous doze. As I drift off, I watch snowy mountains like herds of huge, half-buried white dinosaurs, their saw-toothed scales bristling along the spine ridges.

'Seen as if through gauze'

The announcement by the airplane's captain in German, Hebrew and English tells me what I already know, having sensed the change of inclination of the aircraft and of the sound of the engines; we have begun our descent into Lod Airport, and will soon cross over the coast. I am always surprised at the misty atmosphere. The coast is seen as if through gauze, instead of the expected sharp outlines usual in a Mediterranean climate. Tel Aviv lies in a neat form, consistently chalk-coloured buildings, mostly of the same four- or five-storey height filling the spaces between streets. It is as if the streets and parks were cut into clay, rather than the buildings being placed on what was, until the 1920s, a sand desert.

Tel Aviv

Buses meet the aircraft, which stops out on the tarmac, presumably a security precaution. And indeed, soldiers with stubby machine guns stand at the bottom of the stairs from the plane.

As the bus fills up, silent calculations are made about which side to stand on, to be in an advantageous position for arrival at the immigration and customs hall. In fact, I hear one passenger assuming the tone of experience, confidently instructing his companion where to stand. Smugly, I know he is wrong, and there is an unseemly rush, all pretense of politeness abandoned, when the bus stops. However, the processing is efficient, by hard-eyed, dark Israeli officials in blue uniforms, most of them women.

The cab offered to me is a van, which I refuse. I have learned not to waver, so the dispatcher recognizes I'm not to be persuaded. To the mumbling objection of the van driver, the second taxi in line, an acceptable car, eagerly takes my fare.

He speaks little English, but we make ourselves understood. The Hebrew spoken in Israel has a notably different accent from that of Diaspora religious services, almost Arabic with its glottal stops and throaty consonants. Taxi drivers seem to be universally conservative, taking a hard line on most issues. These in Israel, of course, centre on the question of settlements on the West Bank and the peace talks, with speculation about whether Yitzhak Shamir is, or is not, really interested in making peace.

We usually agree on the inequity of the exemption from military duty given to Orthodox Jews; yet it is their parties who often hold the balance in critical questions affecting both domestic and foreign policy. And in Israel this can mean life or death.

As we leave the airport, the country is wonderfully green from winter rain, the groves of orange trees beautifully maintained, and soft grasses that cover the stony plain. Soon we begin to climb, and we cross more open, low, limestone-strewn hills, and approach the Latrun intersection. A tank mounted on a block, is the monument to the capture in 1948 of the Arab-held British police station by the fledgling Israel army. The police station commands the approaches from the coastal plain to the foothills that lead to the Judean Hills and Jerusalem.

To the west of the intersection is a fine arcaded mansion, a French seminary. There are tales of how the monks, pro-Arab at the time, allowed their buildings to be used by snipers. In 1948 it seemed inconceivable to some European powers that Jews could defeat Arab armies, especially the Arab Legion, trained by the legendary Glubb Pasha.

It never fails to move me as we wind our way through the foothills, and past the memorial forest. Six million trees have been planted, different species of cyprus, pine and poplar representing the men, women and children murdered by the Nazis between 1938 and 1945. Six million is a number that has no impact in the abstract. To see the huge forest, covering hill after hill, arouses in me the same desolate sadness I feel when wandering through the cemeteries on the Marne and the Somme. Innocent young people, with so much promise, so much to give the world, fellow human beings, slaughtered.

The hills grow in size as the road climbs, running up the narrow defile that lies between the flanking heights. Scattered along this route are the metal frames and the armour of the home-made armoured vehicles that ran the Arab gauntlet in 1948 to relieve the siege of Jerusalem in the War of Independence. On each vehicle, in red rustproof paint, a date is stencilled. It is the date on which the vehicle was destroyed, with its young driver and precious cargo.

I invariably feel a frisson at their selfless bravery. They knew the chance of success was small; in fact, death or serious injury was more likely than unscathed passage.

Further up there is a new, very heavily constructed guardrail. This is where the road passes along a ravine edge. Recently, an Arab grabbed the wheel of a bus and turned it into the ravine, injuring and killing some passengers, including one young Canadian girl.

The cypress and cedar, now mixed with Jerusalem pine, are thicker and taller the higher we climb. Where glimpses of the land can be seen, it is layered in limestone, a geographical millefeuille.

On other occasions I have taken the Modi'in Road through the West Bank. The road wends through hills of limestone terraces and olive groves, of cyprus and pine and the sweet smell of honeysuckle. The evening light, intense but soft, illuminates the pale yellow stones and gives a glow to the trees, moulding them into Cézanne landscapes of solid foliage and fractured ground.

Arab villages, their simple geometric buildings loosely but carefully grouped on hilltops, rest in the dusty greenery. Viewed from below, no streets are visible – manmade and natural forms combine in tranquillity.

The villages seem perfectly composed without effort, each village with its minaret giving focus to the varied building clusters. In this magical light and such peaceful scenes, the conflicts that curse this land are invisible.

Jerusalem

Rounding a bend, we see the far outskirts of modern Jerusalem in the fading, golden light. New suburbs are tightly clustered on hilltops, with low-rise apartment blocks of consistent mass, scale and material. As in medieval Italian towns, and no doubt the biblical antecedents here, the edge between developed areas and the forests is pleasingly sharp. This is so, for much the same reasons as those of the past for defence, and to conserve agricultural or forested lands. The compactness of the towns is so satisfying, and the unadulterated countryside, whether arable or infertile, even more so.

By the time we reach the outskirts of Jerusalem, it is the evening rush hour. Buses carrying Arabs in kaffiyehs, taxis piled high with baggage, new cars and many of older vintage form the throng.

Less common to Canadian eyes are the many hitchhikers. Although most are not in uniform, all carry their weapons. Those serving in the Israeli army, essentially a citizen army, are allowed, indeed encouraged, to bear their arms at all times.

Each time I arrive in Jerusalem, and whenever discussion on construction and design, or indeed discussion on any topic (which resembles negotiation more than discussion) becomes heated, I am reminded that we are 300 miles east of Istanbul. We are in the Middle East.

In many ways, Israel is a modern western democracy founded by ardent European socialists who believed in the redeeming qualities of manual labour. But in many respects it reverts to its pre-British-mandate period, and once more becomes Levantine.

This process was accelerated by the large Sephardi immigration from Arab countries. Russians, however, the most recent wave of immigrants, might change the trend. No one knows yet what the effects will be – there has not yet been an election in Israel with a large Russian constituency.

Arriving at the King David Hotel is comforting after leaving home some 20 hours before. Having made many such trips during the process of designing, and now dealing with the construction of the new City Hall complex, I almost believe the professional welcome of the hotel staff.

The hotel has a history. It was the headquarters of the British high command during the days of the mandate. It was during this time that one underground organization – led by Menachem Begin and fiercely opposed by Haganah, the mainstream underground – blew up a wing of the hotel, killing several senior British officers.

My room has a balcony and a breathtaking view of the walls of the Old City. These were built by Suleiman the Great in the 16th century, and rebuilt during the Ottoman empire. The walls have once again been restored by the present municipal administration under the inspired leadership of Mayor Teddy Kollek.

He has done a superb job of custodianship, landscaping the Kidron and Hinnom valleys to set off the walls to advantage. The walls are important in tracing the history of the city, which has been lived in continually for over 4,000 years. The present city grew from the city of David, built near the spring of Shiloah, and now the Arab village of Silwan.

It was on the threshing floor above the village on Mount Moriah that the first communal rituals must have taken place. The threshing floor would have been convenient for this, and would have been given importance by the elevation (elite is a Hebrew word meaning height).

This site gained religious significance over time and subsequently became the site of the temple of Solomon, later becoming the third of the holy places of Islam. It is here we can be reasonably sure that Abraham, Jesus and Mohammed prayed. Jerusalem gives one goosebumps.

I have felt this closeness at other times. My great-grandfather's sister had been in the first aliyah in 1881. Aliyah means literally to go up, but colloquially it means to migrate to Eretz Israel, the soil of Israel. Chai Malka Homer and her husband had drained swamp land and started planting vines. He died of malaria, and her manager robbed her of her savings. She sold the vineyard to the Rothschilds, who started the first wine co-operative in Palestine. I visited her grave on the Mount of Olives, a short distance from the garden of Gethsemane. The family has replaced the gravestone slab, which had been vandalized during the Jordanian occupation from 1948 to 1967.

The Palestinians seem not to have been responsible custodians of property or holy places. I placed a small stone on the slab as is the custom when visiting a grave, and felt a connection, but strangely, not as strong as the one I sensed with the builders of Jerusalem's walls, much, much longer ago.

Babylon was, in a sense, the equivalent in biblical times of North America today, although the Jews had not gone there to seek a better life; they came in captivity after defeat at the hands of Nebuchadnezzar. But exercising their genius for adaptation and survival, they eventually prospered and played an important role in Babylonian society. Nehemiah was one such man of energy and capability, and he went back to an impoverished and broken-down Israel. He organized local labour and resourcefully rebuilt the defences of Jerusalem.

'When we began removing the rock base we came across archeological relics'

Recently his seal was found, a seal mentioned and described in the book of Deuteronomy.

The City Hall

When we began removing the overburden of the rock base on the site where the new City Hall would stand, we came across archeological relics: a small aqueduct, coins and some oil jars from the First and Second Temple periods (980 and 450 BC, respectively), one bearing the seal of the Royal Granary.

These were duly taken off to the Israel Museum. I was concerned about the aqueduct, cut into the rock base, thinking that it would at least hold up construction. But as 1100 CE artifacts are not considered to be of great antiquity, the aqueduct was duly measured, drawn and photographed, and construction proceeded. The site seemed to be under the surveillance of more than the obligatory archeologist; rabbis, priests and mullahs prowled the site. The friendly anthropologist was sure all the bones we discovered were from animals.

One find did stop the work; a Herodian stone was unearthed. This could have proved to be of great significance, as the location of the Third Wall, built in the reign of Herod, if found, would finally determine with accuracy the burial place of Jesus. The reason is that Josephus, the Jewish army commander of the Galilee turned historian of the Judean-Roman wars, provided the measurement of the distance between the Second and Third Walls. Jesus, being a Jew, would have been buried outside the walls of the city. Thus, the discovery of the position of the Third Wall would fix the position of the Second. And the stone seemed to be one that could have been used for such a wall.

There was much head scratching and a bit more digging. This uncovered the foundations of a Crusader leper colony, which would also have been built outside the walls. It was concluded that the Herodian stone had been cannibalized by the Crusaders to build the leper colony, and did not mark the location of the Third Wall. Work on construction resumed once more.

Besides the excavation, work now began in earnest with rock blasting to create a cavity to be filled with a below-plaza garage for 800 cars, as well as underpinning and stabilization of 11 of the 12 buildings to be saved. These are to become part of the civic centre, housing various government departments. The complex can be seen more as a campus or precinct, rather than a city hall. It is deliberately designed, not to have defined edges, but to become integrated with the surrounding city.

The plaza was the subject of much debate. When I received the commission to design the new City Hall in 1988, a zoning ordinance was already in place.

'I appealed to Kollek on the grounds of municipal equity'

This was based on a previous scheme, which had as its centrepiece an elongated L-shaped structure. This would have symbolically turned the municipal centre back on Arab Jerusalem.

I appealed to the project managers on the grounds of efficiency, and to Teddy Kollek on the grounds of municipal equity, to allow me to change the zoning ordinance. Both the project managers and the mayor supported me enthusiastically. I wanted to have a building of both modern efficiency and historic sensitivity, to restore existing buildings and to create a civic plaza equally accessible from all points of the compass. After all, medieval maps show Jerusalem as the centre of the universe, uniting Asia, Africa and Europe. Surely all its citizens should have common ground at City Hall.

All other public spaces in Jerusalem are religious ones. The plaza next to the western wall of the Temple of Solomon for the Jewish faith, the square next to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre for Christians, and the platform on the Temple Mount for Muslims. The joke in Jerusalem has been that if you want to hold a political protest, you have to go to Tel Aviv.

Project meetings during my periodic trips tend to be long and intense. There is always the backlog of work that has built up since the last trip, notwithstanding fax and phone, so days are crammed with site inspection, meetings with consultants, contractors and project managers. The meetings themselves are intensive, as Israelis are not known for their reticence.

Weekends start at midday on Friday in Israel, and last until Saturday evening. Sunday is a normal working day. Whenever I can, I take my small pocket sketchbook and water colours and walk around the Old City sketching and painting on my own and at my own pace.

There is something of interest at every turn of the road. Trite but true: you never see anything well until you draw it. It comes out right if you draw what is really there, and not what you imagine is there. It is odd how perceptions affect the way one sees things, the mind's eye changing proportions from the way they actually are. Until one has the discipline to draw it the way it is, with apparently the wrong proportions, one doesn't get it right.

I suppose while walking around I look like a tourist, a North American, a Jew. This keeps a hard indifference in any dealings with Arabs. As soon as I stop to draw and paint, however, there is a change in attitude. There is discussion about Arab architecture first, and inquiries of where I came from next. The fact that I am Canadian also has a softening effect. I usually ask a local shopkeeper for a glass of water for painting, which gives them a claim over me and makes further discussions easier, especially as I thank them in Arabic, one of the few words I have learned beside the terms for the various finishes for stonework.

Sketching one day by the Damascus Gate, I see an Israeli soldier command some fruit sellers to move their stands off the sidewalk. They do so with sulky expressions, but no sooner has the soldier passed than the stands are back where they were.

Sitting, sipping mint tea in the cotton market with a man who has just sold me delicious lamb kebabs with rosemary sprigs grilled on coals, we hear a group of young Gush Emunim who have established premises deep in Arab Jerusalem, come down the souk singing militantly. We exchange glances – we both feel it would not be proper to comment, but the looks convey our common feelings of criticism and unease.

Jerusalem has been divided since the Romans quartered the city by laying out the Cardo and Decumanis, stretching roughly from Jaffa Gate to the Temple Mount and from the Damascus Gate to the Zion Gate. Each of the quarters has either Armenian, Jewish, Christian or Arab inhabitants.

There has been since the first millennium, a sort of municipal federalism, not exactly multicultural but rather one of coexistence. This seems to have worked in varying degrees of tolerance and could continue to be an effective modus vivendi. Kollek has proposed such a municipal structure for all of Jerusalem, a sort of federal system of municipal districts within a city-state, to overcome what is probably the most intractable of the issues in the Middle East, the status of Jerusalem.

Israeli society is deeply divided. On one side are those who claim all of the land from the Mediterranean to the Jordan as their biblical patrimony, who see no coexistence with Arabs on this land. On the other are those who do not fear the establishment of a Palestinian state, who would trade land for peace, who believe this is in the national interest.

The friends I have made through the project, architectural colleagues mostly, are firmly on the side of trading land for peace. They have earned their way to this position, having served in two wars. One of them was at the Zion Gate in June 1967, a battle fought with small arms only, in order to preserve the monuments but at great cost to human life.

They know the political system – proportional representation as a product of the democratic idealism of the founders of the modern state – must be reformed if there is to be change. No party can gain a strong majority in the Knesset, the parliament, because of the number of small parties that proportional representation produces.

What it means is that anyone gaining enough votes across the country, not from a particular constituency, can become a member of the Knesset. This tends to produce fringe groups, who may number only two or three people with similar outlooks or ideologies. The religious right has several such parties who, despite the small numbers they represent, often hold power over tenuous coalitions between larger parties.

The fringe parties would be wiped out in direct representation. As Shamir depends on them now, he is unlikely to introduce legislation that will deny them power. There is a terrible precedent for this. The Sadducees and Pharisees represented just as deep a split in Jewish society in the first years of the common era, about 68 CE. This internecine battle had as much to do with their defeat as did the power of the Roman 10th Legion. They did not face their enemy as a united force. The Romans did not have to divide to conquer; that had already occurred.

The divisions today are equally debilitating. Keeping haredim out of the army exacerbates them. The army is a wonderful means of acculturating immigrants and forming friendships across social and economic divides that otherwise would keep people apart. It would spread the burden too.

For example, the City Hall project is continually disrupted by engineers, architects, contractors and managers spending time on military duty. This happens frequently and sometimes without warning. It tends to make scheduling difficult.

There are other difficulties too. I had designed the facades of the building to be clad in bands of rose and ochre limestone, known as Jerusalem stone but really coming from Galilee and the West Bank respectively. Galilee stone is no problem, lying inside the greenline, the UN-established boundary of Israel.

However, the rose-coloured stone, coming from the West Bank, lies in Arab quarries. Our supplier has been threatened with death by Palestinians if he supplies us with the stone we need. I fear we will not get the contrast I want, as the stone we have is not markedly rose in colour.

Banded stone is a Mumluke device, used by the splendid Arab architects of the 16th century. It has an added usefulness now; stone is commonly supplied in a 30 cm height, too small in scale for the size of coursing appropriate for a building of this dimension, standing as it will in a large open space.

By combining two 30 cm courses of rose-coloured stone and alternating it with two 30 cm courses of ochre-coloured stone, 60 cm bands are achieved.

Other aspects of the design have also been influenced by Jerusalem's history and physical precedent. The north-south axis of the complex, one subtended by the angle of the Old City wall where it turns from its northern alignment up from the Jaffa Gate to its eastern alignment down to the Damascus Gate, replicates the experience of the souk.

This route is varied in its experience of light and shade, enclosure and openness, in contrasting small and large dimensions. It starts out in a narrow top-lit shopping arcade, opens out into a wide but enclosed and paved court, passes through a stone gate into a larger triangular court planted with trees (to be pollarded to make a canopy) and proceeds through a stone pergola with roof garden onto the main stone plaza.

This axial route is arrested at the main entrance to the municipal building, but continues visually through the building to the Russian compound beyond. The axial approach lies on one of the important ridges that characterize the topography and approximate the old pilgrims' and prophets' walk that came from the north – Haneveim Street.

There is a biblical account that from a point on this ridge, a view could be had of the port of Acre. This was not believed until recently, when upon the demolition of a large building, a distant view of Acre was revealed.

It is the cross-axis, however, which will carry the heavy pedestrian traffic from the Jaffa Road, and hopefully up from the depression, now undeveloped, that lies outside the Damascus Gate and Arab Jerusalem.

In contrast to the stone-paved and formal square, the Gan Daniel (the Daniel Gardens) have been extended and modified to provide the cool, informal contrast to the formal geometry of the square. Cafés will line its length, and lavender its walks. These have been designed so people crossing the path will brush the lavender and release its perfume.

Return

I always dread the process of departure at Lod Airport. It is fraught with frustration – there are, by my last count, five lines to endure. The first is for an interrogation by a security officer. The second is to check in. The third is to show one's boarding pass, the fourth for passport control and the fifth, electronic surveillance for carry-on baggage.

There is also the bus ride, linking terminal to aircraft. It is with some relief that I sit back and relax in the plane, as the usual exhortation bids you do. This is particularly sweet, as normally you have to get up at about 4:45 a.m. to travel to the airport and leave enough time to check in for an 8:00 a.m. flight.

Rising up over orange groves, we cross the same misty coastline, and the aircraft heads northwest over the Mediterranean, Greece, the Balkans, Germany, the British Isles, over the Atlantic and home.

Post Script

The City Hall, now known as Safra Square, was completed in 1993 and opened with much fanfare. Sadly, Teddy Kollek, a Moses figure who initiated the whole enterprise, was no longer mayor. He lives to see

'Design problems can often be expressed as a set of conflicting objectives' the building complete, but not as a home for the policies he envisaged for the city.

He saw the municipal government building, as distinct from buildings for the government of the State of Israel (a state that has yet to separate the secular from the religious, as every modern democracy has done), as neutral ground for every citizen of Jerusalem, regardless of creed.

Had he remained in power, it is arguable that with a pacified urban condition – one of peaceful coexistence, the current impasse to the peace process, that is – the status of Jerusalem would have been a manageable problem.

Notwithstanding the change of municipal administration, the municipal complex has been deemed successful (and the building will outlive the incumbents). As a consequence, my Israeli colleagues and I, who have become chaverim, were invited to participate in a limited design competition for a new building for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, the Misrad Hachutz, which we were fortunate to win. The site is a component of the National Precinct, which is in the process of formation.

This National Precinct includes two types of buildings, the great buildings of state and those of the bureaucracy. The former consist of the Israel Museum, the Knesset and the Supreme Court. Each of these stands in isolation in a park-like setting, enclosed by a ring of the latter type, the administrative buildings.

However, two of these "background" structures are more important than the other administrative buildings: the office of the prime minister (yet to be built and stalled by litigation, not an unusual state of affairs in Israel), and the Foreign Ministry.

Design problems, if carefully analyzed, can often be expressed as a set of conflicting objectives. This condition became our central design problem: how to make a background building and give it an identity of sufficient presence, appropriate to its function as an important building of state. The issue was exacerbated by the Foreign Ministry's location, opposite the excellent Supreme Court building.

Although our design for the Foreign Ministry had been selected, it seemed to us on reflection, that it did not adequately resolve this subtle issue, even though it functioned perfectly well from an operational point of view. As a consequence, we changed the design radically with, I feel confident, a far more satisfying result. The building is now under construction and is due for completion in early summer 2001.

Besides the background/foreground conundrum, there were other design problems. These fell into two categories, practical and symbolic.

The practical difficulties in Israel are not those encountered every day in Canada: all our wall assembly details had to take bomb-blast effects into consideration. This was particularly true of the central reception hall, really a pavilion on its own. In order to present the state with a sense of pride and adequate gravamen (a symbol of state), we had designed a building – whose function is primarily the formal one of receiving representatives of other states – enclosed entirely within alabaster walls and a glass roof.

Israeli security nearly had a fit. As with all security-questionable building construction, a sample of our wall was tested in the Negev at a site built for just this purpose – bomb blast. The first solutions to the problem failed the test. The security official laconically remarked to me that with that design, we could wipe out the entire diplomatic corps at one go. However, we have succeeded in devising systems to prevent shrapnel from flying about, and the last test of this system proved positive.

The building beside the alabaster reception hall houses the home base for Israeli diplomats, the Foreign Minister's entourage, a school for diplomats, a ballroom/lecture hall and the situation room. This last is of highest concern in terms of security; it is able to withstand direct bomb hits and gas attacks. But the visitor to the complex will not, I am pleased to say, be aware of the security measures taken, apart from the normal checkpoint on entry.

The building is designed to be one of the chain of buildings that line the National Boulevard, yet it was to have a distinct identity, one of modesty but exuberant delicacy. This has been achieved with very careful detailing of Jerusalem stone, contrasted with light metal roofs and perforated teak screens. The building and landscape also contribute to this sense of groundedness without heaviness; the two have been carefully integrated.

'The buildings and landscapes have been carefully integrated'

I took Teddy Kollek, who still goes to the Jerusalem Development Fund offices each day, on a tour of the construction site. He has a passion for architecture, and I knew he would enjoy the tour even if he has some difficulty now in getting about.

I could see from his reaction that he took pride in seeing the distance Israel in general, and Jerusalem in particular, have come from the early days of rough improvisation, which was necessary in a country with few resources other than courage, fighting for existence in the tumultuous Middle Eastern context.

While working in Israel is never easy (Israelis are not known for their accommodation or trust), I still marvel at my exceptional luck in being alive at a time when Jews can design and build in Jerusalem in a Jewish state, historically a rare occurrence. To be among those few is an extraordinary privilege.

Battles for Yerushalayim

By YAACOV KAPLAN

From the summit of Mount Scopus, may peace be with you, O Jerusalem. From the top of Mount Scopus, I shall kneel and bow deeply in complete prostration. For thousands of generations, I have dreamt about you. I should live to see it, to see the light of your face. Yerushalayim, Yerushalayim! Do shine your face upon me, your son. From your ruins, I shall rebuild you.

Traditional Song: From the summit of Mount Scopus.

Certain points in the history of Yerushalayim have become important landmarks for me – focal points leading up to the Six Day War. This war liberated the city and gave the Jewish people the right to govern all of Yerushalayim – a right they had lost to the Romans and then again in 1948 to the Arabs.

Yet, despite the battles and the wars, Yerushalayim has always been at the centre of Jewish thinking. It was here that the House of Hillel thrived. Back then, the study houses in Yerushalayim overflowed with students from all parts of the land.

Yaacov Kaplan

Even from the Diaspora they came to study. It was this status of Yerushalayim that helped to establish the city as a thriving cultural and economic centre.

Yerushalayim has a history of Houses of Learning for all the various sects and it is and always has been a place of pilgrimage for all Jews from the land and from outside the land.

During the time of the reign of Herod, a new wave came over Yerushalayim. Of all the Jewish rulers, Herod especially wanted to change the appearance of the city.

Herod, who became governor of the area in 47 BCE, excelled in the creation of beautiful buildings and the city grew in area and population. Yerushalayim was transformed into one of the most wonderful cities in the Eastern world.

The principal projects undertaken by Herod included the great tower of Phasael within the Hasmonite city, and the building of two additional towers, Hippicus and Mariamne nearby. Each tower served as a fortress on the north and defended Herod's castle which was erected where the Citadel is today.

The castle spread southward and in it, Herod built homes and gardens in the Hellenistic style.

The most important of all his works, though, was the renewal of the building of the Beit Hamikdash, the Temple. This was a huge project which continued for many years, even after his death.

As a surrounding to the Beit Hamikdash, he expanded the mountain base by arranging a square that he spread when he erected huge walls. One of those walls is the Kotel Hama'aravi – the Western Wall.

Due to floodings which occurred in the valleys, Yerushalayim was built in the shape of two fortresses – the upper city, and the Holy Temple which was surrounded with a wall. By each of these fortresses, the immensity of Herod's castle spread along the east and the west.

Herod's fortress on the western side is the fortress of Antonia on the Temple Mount.

After Herod's death, the final uprising against the Romans began in the summer and started with short battles, in and around Antonia, in east Jerusalem, and the castle in west Jerusalem.

Focal points leading to the Six Day War

Rebels destroyed the small Roman Army and then chased the army of Agrippa II, who was an ally of the Romans.

Agrippa's legion came from Syria and attacked Yerushalayim during Sukkot. While his forces succeeded in taking over the new city, they failed when attacking the Har Habayit (Temple Mount) and the Old City. Agrippa II was forced to pull back. During this time, the city was almost completely annihilated, but Yerushalayim was left free for three years.

Right through this time, internal fighting between the Jews divided the different sects. Only when Titus arrived in Yerushalayim, accompanied by four Roman legions, did the Jewish people begin to overcome their divisiveness.

Yochanan from Gush Chalav was the commander for the Temple and the lower part of the city. And on the upper city, Shimon Bar Giora was given the command.

The battle started on Passover, 66 CE. The Roman forces broke through the protecting walls. They fought a fierce battle to gain the heart of Yerushalayim. On the 17th day of Tammuz, they broke through to the Temple. On the ninth of Av, 70 CE, the Romans burnt the second Temple.

I don't say that I am not the blood of Judah HaMacabee, because three drops from his blood were absorbed in my blood. Ze'ev Jabotinsky.

In the 1948 battles for Yerushalayim, our fighters believed they were stronger, even though they were fewer than the Arab forces.

'Clearing the Latrun Road which led to the city'

To liberate Yerushalayim, the battles centred on clearing the Latrun road which led to the city, and then uprooting the Arab villagers.

The military campaign took the form of a series of discrete actions, which took place in April and May, and were aimed at breaking though the Arab blockade of the city.

The Jebusi action began on April 20 with efforts to open the road. While this operation managed to finally liberate Katamon, on the west side of the city, the Yoram action unsuccessfully attempted to open the the road to Latrun from the east.

Other battles for Yerushalayim included those fought on Har Tzion and Ramat Rachel. The Maccabi operation was another attempt to open the road, with battles occurring on Beit Machsir and Meshlatim.

The need to save the hundreds of Jewish people in Yerushalayim became a driving force. Many of the resources were drawn from other parts of the country and on April 6, the battle of Nachshon was launched and three convoys successfully entered Jerusalem.

The Yoram Operation was the final effort to open the Latrun road and while it was not successful, the forces managed to retain control of the Jewish part of Jerusalem.

Throughout all these battles, Jewish fighters were confronting an Arab-British force that viewed the road to Yerushalayim as the major point of weakness in the Jewish defence.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5761

'Their aim was to starve Yerushalayim'

We stood against a powerful Arab force which had ample supplies of ammunition and support from the neighbouring Arab nations.

The Arabs chose to fight us by summoning fighters from the villages and ambushing us on the surrounding roads and hills.

They were behind shelters and outside our shooting range. Ambushes were planted along the declines of the mountains from Sha'ar HaGai, Cerise, Kever HaShesh, and behind their lowest station, a copse of trees, behind Nevei Ilan, and behind the slopes of Kastell – and in hidden places on the other side of Colonia and Beit Ichsa.

The Arabs imposed a psychologically paralyzing effect on us by spreading themselves around us as if they were a hundred times greater than we were. Fears of a huge army against us seemed very real. The Arabs would set our damaged vehicles and tires on fire and we began to feel that we had no chance to overcome them.

Their aim was to starve Yerushalayim and to force a complete surrender.

The guiding leader at the head of the Husseini force was a sophisticated military personality, Abdel Kader, whose influence allowed him to gather huge numbers under his flag.

We stood against this huge force. In this part of the land, on the road to Yerushalayim, we were the very few.

The Hebrew fighting forces that came from Sha'ar HaGai

'Many volunteers were attracted to fight for Israel's survival' into Yerushalayim were what was left of one of the Palmach battalions, one of the most cherished fighting units that had already shed their blood in the surrounding area.

The best of its commanding officers based their work and training on ideological beliefs and the knowledge that the only way to overcome the enemy forces was through military means.

That meant that the whole nation depended on their abilities. Everyone was willing and prepared to put the full force of their arms into action.

The assimilation of different peoples, the human combination of those units, was a wonderful achievement.

For those who had made aliyah and were partaking in the battles, the war was a continuation of their recognition of the need for the existence of the nation – fighting was natural for them to accept.

Then there were also the youth from the Hityashvut Haovedet, the elite of high school graduates, young men and volunteers, the best of the Chalutz Training Forces.

There were many volunteers who were attracted to fight for Israel's survival – sometimes one soldier per family, and sometimes two from a town. They included children of Diaspora survivors.

This was the beginning of the Israeli Defence Forces and the fight became the essence of their lives.

The combinations of these forces created a wonderful synthesis and the enthusiasm of these fighters created the skeleton and the building blocks for the many who followed them into the ranks of the army.

Many fell during this time. In 1950, Prime Minister David Ben Gurion requested that the government establish a memorial for the Unknown Soldier. A year later, President Yitzchak Ben Tzvi, himself a bereaved parent who had lost a son in the War of Independence, requested that memorials be built in nine different regions of the country.

But these suggestions were turned down. It would seem that it was beyond the Jewish comprehension that there be an Unknown Soldier. Instead, an eternal light was erected at the entrance to the Knesset and it serves as the State memorial.

The Six Day War brought these two histories together – it united a divided city.

The words of the commanding officer that liberated Yerushalayim – "the Temple Mount is in our hands" echoed on the airwaves and became part of the excitement that took hold of the nation.

Cheif of Staff, Yitzhak Rabin, accepted an honourary doctorate from Hebrew University on behalf of the IDF after the Six Day War. [WZPS photo]

Mota Gur was the Chief of Staff of the Israeli Army at that time.

The most difficult battle took place on Ammunition Hill which was under Jordanian control. The victory on Ammunition Hill was one of the greatest heroic efforts ever accomplished.

It was a battle that expressed the longing of a nation that through thousand of generations proclaimed the oath, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, I will forget my right hand. My tongue will cleave to the roof of my mouth."

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5761

ON MEETING HARRY

I met a man of 92
with ruddy cheeks and eyes so blue quoting Shaw and Churchill and "The Mikado" too.

And all this in Jerusalem new.

His lineage is long his interests wide — muses, commerce, continents collide.

"You're a breath of fresh air, forgive, your age?"
I smile. Rounder of elbow
"but sufficiently decayed."

We read poems to each other that is, I struggle while his photographic memory unfailing —
he quotes, declaims, recites proclaiming — an adorned limerick with a homespun tale, a gilded valentine without fail.

O wonderous ripeness,
Marvelous Harry,
I came so tired,
I left so merry,
to meet a man of 92
with spirit bright and eyes so true
quoting Shaw and Churchill too.

And all this in Jerusalem new.

by Donia Blumenfeld Clenman

REJOICE THACKERAY BE MERRY TWAIN

An exquisite sight.
The inhabited city.
Rejoice Thackeray.
Be Merry Twain.
The jewelled lights
the terraced hills roads descending ascending.

Beautiful is living Jerusalem.
The howling winds and plaintive birds mere variants of her laughter.
Last night, a star immense mythological,
shone somewhere beyond Orion.

Into darkness I peer.
Past dwellings reality?
divinity?

She belongs to everyone and no one.
Elusive is my Jerusalem
a love
a promise.

How sacrilegious my wish
To give verbal expression to
My first encounter with you.

A thought perches on a fleeting instant
In a corner of my mind:
What have I ever done
To deserve
To stand near you?

The black characters in the Book Of Psalms
Do a weird and wild spiritual dance
As they mingle with my tears.

And beneath the diurnal heat of an eternal sun
My heart shivers
In the chilling shadows of
All the Jews that ever lived
Suffered and died
With the silently screaming prayer
On their parched infants'
Children's, youthful, mature, and ancient lips
To return to you!

Worshippers at the Western Wall in the late 19th century.

'Jerusalem, a symbol of God's concern with history'

By RABBI DAVID HARTMAN

Q. What is the central challenge facing us today?

Throughout history, Jerusalem has been a symbol of God's stake in human history. For the three major monotheistic faiths – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – Jerusalem was a powerful symbol of God's concern with history and of the redemptive scheme which would vindicate the beliefs of the one, true faith. There could be only one carrier of the truth. Gaining control of Jerusalem meant gaining control of the secret to God's redemptive design for history.

David Hartman

The history of monotheism in general, and the history of Jerusalem in particular, have been histories of holy wars and conflicts because of this belief in the exclusivity of God's plan for realizing the grand scheme of human history. Christianity thus claimed to be the heir of Judaism, and Islam, the heir of both Judaism and Christianity. Each faith viewed the other as its enemy – the enemy of religious truth as such. The question that must be faced today is whether this was the inevitable consequence of the religious framework rooted in the biblical tradition. Is fundamentalism with its single-truth, absolutist claim the necessary legacy of Jerusalem for the modern world?

In total contrast to this orientation, I have argued that the Jewish return to Jerusalem can be viewed, not as yet another attempt at capturing the universal, but as a return to the particular. Ours is the return of the eldest son, the rejected son, the son who was excluded from sharing in the blessing.

Jewish homelessness and exile had been interpreted as signs of Divine rejection and as the vindication of the Christian doctrine of the New Covenant. Israel's homelessness was theologically necessary in order to confirm the truth of the gospel proclaiming the "good news" of the arrival of the New Israel.

I fervently hope that that the world has passed beyond that type of triumphalism and is ready for a new appreciation of religious pluralism.

It is important, therefore, for people to understand what Jerusalem means to Jews. Tel Aviv points towards the future. It is the modern, fast-moving, technological centre of Israeli society; a city which, to quote its motto, "never goes to sleep." Jerusalem, on the other hand, goes to sleep at night. It is the city of long memories, the city which reminds Jews that they are 3,000 years old. In Jerusalem, Jews live in dialogue with their history. Jerusalem proclaims for all to hear: "We are not here because of the Holocaust. We are not here because of Western guilt. We are here because we never left. We are home."

Jerusalem is the ingathering of a people to its home after years of separation and wandering. This idea is the cornerstone to building genuine peace in the Middle East. Viewing Israel as a post-Holocaust phenomena makes the State of Israel into a passing historical episode. It is crucial, therefore, that Christians and Muslims understand what Jews mean when they say: "We are home."

The non-Jewish world must know that we are no longer wandering Jews, suffering because of the curse of a rejecting God. We are no longer the persecuted victims of history. We are strong and healthy and also weak and vulnerable like all ordinary human beings. Unless you begin to see us in a new way the demon of triumphalism will continue to be monotheism's legacy to the world.

The song which Jews have sung for Jerusalem during the past 2,000 years, Next Year in Jerusalem, is a message to the world that history must change if there is to be hope for pluralism. It was, and is, a prayer that one day the demonic forces of triumphalism will be defeated, and we will be able to assert our dignity, sing our song, be loyal to our past without having to apologize for our particularity.

'The need for Jewish self-justification is over'

In the past, Jews could not affirm commitment to their faith without first justifying why they chose not to accept Christianity. Moses Mendelssohn wrote his book Jerusalem in defence of his choice to remain a Jew in spite of his renowned intelligence and erudition. Our return to the city of Jerusalem means that the writing of such books is finally over. The need for Jewish self-justification is over. The battle for our right to breathe as Jews is over. This is the meaning of: We are home.

When Islam and Christianity recognize our coming home, we will have no difficulty making room for them. When you are a stranger, you cannot welcome guests. When you know you are at home, you can.

Lasting peace is thus connected to the world's acknowledging the Jewish people's claim to be returning to their home, to the home that was so deeply embedded in their souls for over 2,000 years. This is what makes the issue of Jerusalem an integral part of the peace process.

Q. If Jerusalem is home for Jews, can it also be home for Christians and Muslims?

There is no problem for others to feel at home in Jerusalem, nor for Jews to make them feel welcome here. As I mentioned above, when someone feels secure and at home, welcoming others is easy and non-threatening. The problematic issue we face today, however, is whether Islam and Christianity can live with the vitality of Judaism. Are we to remain the founding religion which you superseded and discarded on your way to the new faith? Do you, as Christians, seek us out in order to find out about your past or do you wish to enter into a dialogue with us – a dialogue that may affect your present and your future? We can have a genuine discussion only if you view me not as a transitory episode of the past but as a vital, autonomous living community.

Jewish life is not a transitory episode

This type of acknowledgement and recognition represents a radical change in the history of the relations of our faiths. It entails a fundamental mind shift, which, were it to take place would have a remarkable effect on resolving many of the seemingly intractable political conflicts in the middle East and throughout the world. The despicable notion of holy war and of all absolutistic claims to truth – be they under religious or secular auspices – can only be healed by recovering the dignity of particularity that doesn't claim to be the only particularity. In other words, my sense of home doesn't require that Palestinians be strangers here.

God's involvement in human history

Q. Why, theologically, is the focus on Jerusalem within a particular geographical frame?

Jerusalem always played an important role in the great story of western culture, the Bible. Jerusalem is one of its central motifs. It is where the Temple stood, where the immanence of God was incarnated in its most concrete form. In contrast to Greek philosophic notion of an ahistorical idea of divinity wholly removed from the imperfections of matter and history, Jerusalem signified God's interest and involvement in human history.

It is no wonder that walking through the Old City can make a person claustrophobic. Buildings are built right next to one another or on top of one another. Quarters are jealously guarded, and border disputes extend to the interiors of holy buildings. Construction is a political act. Erecting the Mosque on the site where the Temple stood means: "I am taking over now!"

The closeness and congestion is not simply due to the lack of space. A better allocation of building sites which would make room for your Temple, your Mosque and your Holy Sepulcher, would not really solve the issue. The problem is not the lack of space, but who controls it. Who, in other words, is the inheritor?

The biblical story is throughout informed by the principle that only one child inherits. The theme of the chosen versus the rejected recurs repeatedly throughout the Bible. One son gets the blessing while the other gets none. This motif still reverberates in the minds of those claiming to have inherited the biblical tradition. The logic of religious faith is either/or – either you are blessed or you are rejected. The story that created the promise of Jerusalem also created the curse of the eternal battle over Jerusalem.

I believe that our role as Jews today is to change this aspect of the story. We began the story and now we have come back to say that our story has another part which states that God listens to many different songs and melodies. No single melody need drown out the others. This is my dream and my hope for Jerusalem.

Q. There is a perennial theological/political problem about the Temple Mount...

Israel showed great restraint after the Six Day War with respect to the Mosque. It was considered natural and expected for the triumphant conqueror of the holy city to take over this site and rebuild the Temple on its original foundations. There were many who felt: "We have been repudiated for 2,000 years. We have been ignored; we have been molested oppressed, brutalized. Now that we have won, let us assert our dignity, our power, our triumph." Is this not precisely what Jordan did to the synagogues in Jerusalem when it took control in '48?

Nonetheless, we didn't do that. Instead we expressed our deeper instinct that our present task was not to undermine Islam's feelings for Jerusalem nor to challenge Christianity's connection with the Holy Land. These faiths must be allowed to flourish here in the city which Jews call home. It was a deeply spiritual decision. Many political decisions have been made by Israelis and by others in this region without their realizing their theological implications. The Vatican's decision to establish diplomatic relations with Israel, and the Pope's recent visit to Jerusalem was a clear case in point. The meaning of this political act lay in the theological implication that Jews were no longer regarded as a homeless people. The Pope, in effect, acknowledged that the Jewish people are not an exilic people, destined to wander as a homeless people throughout history.

Our psyche must also change if we are to internalize the meaning of our no longer being in exile. We must move away from perceiving ourselves as vulnerable, marginal figures living at the edges of history to regarding ourselves as a visible community that is strong, autonomous and proud.

Being visible and strong is the basis of healthy moral relationships with the rest of the world. If you are weak and visible, you invite either pity or aggression. If you are strong and visible, you invite moral responses and challenges.

Q. Your prayer at the Passover seder: Next year in Jerusalem!... Historically speaking, was it meant literally or just spiritually?

Jerusalem was always the concrete Jerusalem, not a heavenly concept. Jews prayed for rain for the farmers in the Galilee when they themselves lived in Poland, in Denmark, France. The primal instinct was that we never really left. We were the mourners of Jerusalem. When 'Jerusalem was always a living reality'

Jews visited a mourner they said: May God comfort you among the other mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

At weddings, Jews broke a glass as a symbol of their exile from Jerusalem. They prayed for the day when they would dance with the bride and groom in the streets of Jerusalem. Jerusalem was not a spiritual domain, an otherwordly symbol of piety, but a living reality where children were born, where people ate and drank, a place inhabited by Jewish bodies. Jews always looked to Jerusalem as an earthy spatial framework in which to live out their spiritual destiny.

Q. How important are the specific holy spots in Jerusalem, particularly the Western Wall as opposed to the greater gestalt of Jerusalem as a general place?

Jerusalem is part of both the modern and ancient worlds. Living with the bustle and excitement of the modern world while carrying the memory of the past is a vital quality of Jerusalem. There is a constant tension between the needs of this modern city for good hospitals, schools and roads and claims of its long history. It is more than a coincidence that every time digging begins on a new road or building project, it is soon halted because some ancient bones or archeological site is accidentally unearthed.

Here, the past and the future speak to you at the same time. And you have to listen to both. You have to juggle the claims of the future, the present and the past simultaneously. That's what makes for a kind of craziness.

You don't quite know where you are living. Are you living in the times of King David or of Michael Jackson? Or are you waiting to welcome the Messiah? There are so many different rhythms that compete for your attention at the same time. That is what makes this such a fascinating city in which to live.

Boundaries can always be moved or adjusted. Jerusalem signifies our having come here, not because of Hitler but because of our loyalty to the promise of Abraham. We never gave up our belief in God's love for Israel. We never abandoned Israel after the Temple was destroyed. We refused to see ourselves as God's rejected sons. This is what Jerusalem stands for.

The issue is not this district, this boundary, this structure. There is a much deeper aspect to our return to Jerusalem. Tel Aviv brings you into the modern world whereas Jerusalem forces you into a dialogue with 3,000 years of history. And it is that dialogue that the world must pay attention to. In fact, it is that dialogue that is the most important source of hope for establishing new foundations for the interrelationship between Judaism, Christianity and Islam in the modern world. I want to listen to the music of Islam and I want to hear the sound of Christian church bells in my city because I believe that the Jewish people's return to Jerusalem has enormous historical implications for the future of pluralism, for the future healing of the ugly notion of holy wars.

This is the crucial importance of the Jewish return to Jerusalem, of Jewish visibility in Jerusalem, of Jewish dignity in Jerusalem. The crucial message is: We are not an idea. Ideas belong in books. They don't take up space. We however, are living people. We breathe, we eat. And it is our bodily presence in Jerusalem that the world must begin to see and to acknowledge, not our graveyards nor the ghosts of our spiritual past.

If Christianity and Islam were to come to terms with that fact and were to give up the obsolete, single-truth belief frameworks of the past then they would become relevant and vital options for the future of humanity. In this sense, the key to Christianity's and Islam's future contribution to the spiritual well-being of the world depends on their ability to rethink their attitude towards Judaism and specifically to the reborn people of Israel.

Loyal to the sacredness of life

All fundamentalist groups who are prepared to sacrifice human lives for ideologies are dangerous. Religions that breed violence and wars are forms of idolatry. Pagan temples are built on violence. My loyalty is not to maps or to texts, but to the sacredness of life. If the sacredness of life is violated because of texts, then change the texts.

The ultimate guiding principle of a spiritual life has to be: Does it serve life? Does it create more patience and compassion for people? If it does, then you are on the way to serve God. If it doesn't, if your faith is a barrier between yourself and other human beings, then you must have taken the wrong road.

Building Jerusalem for today and tomorrow

By EHUD OLMERT
Special to The CJN

Jerusalem, the united capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people, is holy to the world's three major monotheistic religions and thus is a focus for pilgrimage for millions of people from all over the world. We protect and preserve the myriad sacred and historical sites in the city, while at the same time turning Jerusalem into a modern, progressive metropolis. This special combination of ancient and modern gives Jerusalem a unique dimension, and we are always aware that the city must be a vibrant, livable entity and must not turn into a museum.

Ehud Olmert

With an area of 123 dunams, or around 30 acres, and a population in the region of 650,000, the city of Jerusalem is the largest in Israel. In recent years, millions of shekels have been invested in developing the physical infrastructure of the city. We emphasize transportation; the road system, in particular, has seen extensive development, and we have begun preparing a light railway which will be operational in 2004. This mass transit system will improve the quality of life of the city's residents and afford environmental protection by reducing traffic on the city's roads – and thus the level of pollution.

In strengthening the economic, demographic and social structure of Jerusalem and discouraging emigration from the city, especially on the part of young families, we have encouraged the construction of thousands of housing units. Several new neighbourhoods with over 2,000 housing units each, together with projects consisting of hundreds of units in existing neighborhoods, are taking care of the city's housing needs. Of course, these new developments include formal educational establishments and centres for leisure activities, commercial centres, parks and all the requisite amenities.

We are also investing heavily in eastern Jerusalem, in the physical infrastructure and in the fields of education, health and culture, in order to close the gaps which exist between the different parts of the city, and we have been promised extra government funding for this purpose. I feel very strongly that we must ensure equality of services to all residents, and that this will serve to strengthen the unity of the city.

In a city where a high percentage of the population works in government offices and allied workplaces which do not generate income, I am fully aware of the advantages of technological development, and Jerusalem has become the high-tech centre of

'I invite you to visit the unique city of Jerusalem'

Israel. We are developing industrial parks with a total area of over 2,000 square metres to encourage start-ups and established companies, and Jerusalem is defined as a special development area so that government grants and other advantages are available to industry here.

The high-tech industry is especially appropriate to Jerusalem; firstly, because it does not upset the delicate environmental balance that we maintain between ancient and modern; and secondly, because it suits the special characteristics of our population. We have a very high percentage of ultra-orthodox residents who prefer not to work in service industries or government offices because of contact with the public, which makes it difficult to maintain separation between men and women. Work on a computer may even be done at home, which is especially helpful as religious families tend to be very large. In addition, we have welcomed a large number of immigrants from the former Soviet Union to the city in recent years, many of whom have a very strong background in technology.

We have recently opened a college of technology, which works in conjunction with industry to ensure that the emerging workforce is appropriate to our industries – so that we avoid a "brain drain" of our most highly-qualified youngsters.

On the level of culture, the city encourages its 50 museums, eight theatres, 25 orchestras, many dance troupes and music ensembles, and its wonderful network of cultural centres which are constantly developing new directions for their artistic enterprises. The annual Israel Festival is an international event of the first order; we hold an annual Film Festival, and Jerusalem is an important centre for international conferences. Leisure activities are well catered-for, with a great many restaurants and sidewalk cafes in the city centre.

I invite you to come and visit the unique city of Jerusalem and to see for yourselves the modern city which has emerged alongside the ancient sites – with no conflict between the two.

Zubin Mehta takes 'time-out' from Israel Philharmonic

By SARAH HERSHENSON
WZPS

"Next year," says conductor Zubin Mehta with a sparkle in his dark eyes, "I will be the oldest member of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

"At 65, when my colleagues go on pension, I hope to continue, and mature, as conductors are said to do," he adds modestly.

Mehta's personality, humour, charisma and formidable expertise as a conductor have endeared him to the Israeli public and the members of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra (IPO) for the last 30 years, even winning him the prestigious Israel Prize in 1991. But next season, he is looking forward to celebrating a different schedule and venue.

Mehta, who was appointed the IPO's music director for life in 1981, and who's been with the orchestra since 1968, will soon be taking a sabbatical year from his usual duties. Instead of arriving in Israel every two or three months to conduct concerts and take the orchestra on its biannual international tour, his only public appearance with the IPO will be to close the season, when he will present the concert version of the operetta Die Fledermaus by Johann Strauss.

What will he be doing all year? "You will not find me lazing around," he jokes. "Neither will I be able to spend more time with my family, who are spread out all over the world."

This season will find Mehta working extremely hard in his other job, as music director of the Bavaria State Opera (BSO) in Munich. The BSO gives about 40 to 50 different opera performances each season.

Under Mehta, the BSO will also persent the world premiere of a newly-commissioned opera, The House of Bernada Alba, based on a play by Garcia Lorca, which he will have to learn "from scratch," he says.

"Moreover, we have two new productions, Falstaff and The Trojans, which require enormous time and effort," he adds.

So busy is Mehta's schedule that when his father, Mehli Mehta, 92 and also a conductor, gave his final concert in April of this year with the American Youth Symphony in Los Angeles, Zubin was unable to attend. "I owe a great debt to my parents, for my music started completely in my home when I was a boy in India," he says.

Mehta is certain he will miss the IPO while on sabbatical. "I know I am going to," he says thoughtfully. "I just need a bit of time this coming year to really breathe and do justice to these new productions. Nevertheless, it will be hard to be away. For me, being in Israel and with the orchestra is like being home, and I will miss being home."

Before taking leave, Mehta has put his home orchestra in good order for the year. "In my absence, I know that if the conductors are not very good, the orchestra will go down, and I will not let that happen," he states emphatically.

"Avi Shoshani, the IPO secretary general, works extremely hard to get the best possible people. It is not always easy, but, compared to other rosters in Europe and America, we are extremely well off."

Mehta is not afraid to invite the best. Some of the brightest lights on the conductor's podium, such as Kurt Masur, Giuseppe Sinopoli, Wolfgang Sawallisch, Danielle Gatti, Christoph von Dohnayni and Lorin Mazel, will lead the orchestra during the new season.
